So the House determined that the main question should be put; which main question was, "shall the bill pass?"

Mr. BIDDLE demanded the yeas and nays on that question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 110, nays 66, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beaty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. So the bill was passed.

Mr. RHETT moved that, when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Moaday next, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. RUSSELL demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, the question was then taken by tellers, and, there being but 89 ayes and 27 noes, no quorum voting, the motion was lost.

On motion of Mr. R. GARLAND,

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 28, 1840.

Mr. LINCOLN, by universal consent, laid before the House, and had referred to the appropriate committee, certain matters relating to the publication, under contract, of the Biennial Register.

Mr. CHAPMAN, in accordance with previous notice given, and on leave, introduced a bill to establish certain post routes in and through the Territory of Iowa, and to certain others therein mentioned; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KEIM made an ineffectual effort to introduce a resolution assigning rooms to the several committees of which he was a member.

Mr. HOWARD of Indiana, by universal consent, presented certain petitions in relation to the extension of the pre-emption laws; which were referred to the committee having charge of petitions on the same subject.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report and estimate for a harbor at the mouth of Root river, near Racine, on the west shore of Lake Michigan, Wiskonsin Territory, made in obedience to instructions inferred from a letter from the Colonel of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, dated 17th October, 1839, to Lorenzo Janes, and others, of Racine, Wiskonsin Territory; which was

On motion of Mr. CROSS, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, laid before the House depositions from the city of Newark, in relation to the New Jersey election.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina moved that they be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected; which, having caused some conversation between Messrs. CAMPBELL, STANLY, and R. GARLAND, as to the propriety of the reference, they were ordered to lie on the table till Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER announced the unfinished business of the morning hour to be the resolution heretofore reported by Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, from the Committee of Elections, to print all the testimony in relation to the contested election in the State of New Jersey, to which an amendment had been heretofore offered by Mr. R. GARLAND to print the testimony received since the report of the said committee was made.

Mr. PRENTISS rose and asked leave of the House to make a remark or two applicable to the allegation against him, made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] in his speech of yesterday, when in Committee of the Whole on the Treasury Note bill. No objection being made, Mr. P. went on to say that he had learned this morning, from verbal sources, that his colleague, in speaking of him, had stated that he (Mr. P.) was the editor of a Federal newspaper which opposed the last war, and with others of his political associates, he had rejoiced at the victories of the enemy over the American arms. It was true, Mr. P. said, that he was a Federalist at the period referred to, and that he edited a paper which sustained Federal doctrines. The reason was that he was born and bred in Massachusetts, the hot bed of Federalism, and that it took time and reflection to eradicate early impressions. He did oppose the declaration of war, as having been made prematurely and without adequate preparation for a contest with such a powerful nation as England; but he utterly denied that he ever o posed the war after the conflict began. So much in regard to the imputation of being a Federalist, and opposing the war in the columns of his paper. Now, in regard to the allegation of having "rejoiced at the victories of the enemy over the American arms." During the canvass for a seat on this floor, in the year 1836, the Whig paper in his (Mr. P's) district, did make a charge of the same character as that reiterated by his colleague, and it was promptly refuted and falsified by the signatures of foerteen of he most respectable citizens of the place where he (Mr. P.) resides, who were residents during the whole of the war, and three of them [Messrs. Groves, Nicholls, and Russell] members of the Whig Central Corresponding Committee of the county, the latter of whom was a member of the late Harrisburg Convention, which nominated General Harrison for President. The charge is in all respects untrue, and he (Mr. P.) had the record at home to prove it to be so. One word more, and Mr. P. had done. He confessed his Federal prepossessions, until the year 1821, when light beamed upon his mind, and he had since given his best services to the Democratic interest, as a matter of principle. The political sin was repented of, and the intelligent electors of Democratic Otsego had pronounced their forgiveness, by twice deputing him to representing them on this floor.

Mr. MEDILL, who was entitled to the floor, made an able vindication of the majority of the Committee of Elections, from the charges which had been made against it by Messrs. BOTTS and FILLMORE, in their speeches, and in their minority report. His speech will be published hereafter. He had not concluded at the expiration of the morning hour, at which time

The House proceeeded to the consideration of bills on the private calendar; when the following engrossed bills on the Speaker's table were taken up, read the third time, and passed:

A bill for the relief of Zachariah Jellison;
A bill for the relief of Bates and Lacon;
A bill for the relief of James W. Osborne;

A bill for the relief of Meigs D. Benjamin and Co.;
A bill for the relief of Wm. Wickham;
A bill for the relief of John M. Jacquelin; and A bill for the relief of George Willis.

Engrossed bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown came up in its order; when

Mr. ATHERTON spoke in opposition to, and Mr REYNOLDS in favor of, the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said the debate cost more than five hundred dollars per hour, which was considerably more than the claim amounted to, of the justness of which there could be no question, and which he was in favor of, and therefore moved the previous question; which was seconded, and,

The question then being, "Shall the main question be ordered?"

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered, and,

The main question having been ordered, which main question was, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. GRIFFIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 74, nays 63.

So the bill was passed.

The bill for the relief of John M. Jaquelin came up in its order, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The consideration of several other bills was then postponed till Saturday next; after which,

Mr. LEET said the members were very much fatigued, from their protracted sessions this week, and it was now 3 o'clock; he would therefore move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Maine demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 45, nays 70. No quorum voting.

Mr. TURNEY moved a call of the House, which was not ordered; when

On motion of Mr. GATES, and the yeas and nays not having been ordered,

The House then adjourned.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the resolution on the subject, reported a bill relative to the transportation of the mail in steamboats; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Resolved, That a select committee of three members be appointed to make a legal and documentary report, founded upon laws and documents on the origin and character of the fishing bounties and allowances, and to show the reason and motive for granting the same, with an accurate reference to every law and document quoted and relied upon, and that the said committee be appointed by the CHAIR.

The resolution was considered and adopted, and the CHAIR appointed the following Senators as said committee:

Mr. BENTON,
Mr. DAVIS, and
Mr. ANDERSON.

Mr. HUBBARD offered the following resolution, which was unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to purchase twenty copies of the third volume of Reports on Finance, for the use of the Senate chamber, the Secretary's office, and the different committees of the Senate; provided, that said third volume can be purchased without taking the first two volumes, with which the Senate have already been supplied.

The various bills passed by the House of Representatives on Saturday, and which were noticed in the Globe of that date, were taken up and referred to their appropriate committees with the exception of the TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The bill additional to the act on the subject of Treasury notes being taken up,

Mr. HUBBARD said this bill had been passed by the House as it was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, a printed copy of which had been placed on each Senator's desk, and the Committee on Finance had taken the bill under their consideration, and agreed to report it to the Senate without amendment, and directed him to ask that it be made the special order of the day at one o'clock.

Mr. YOUNG hoped that the Cumberland road bill might be taken up, and informally passed over, so that no other bill than the present might take precedence of it on the calendar.

Mr. HUBBARD said that if his motion prevailed, the Cumberland road bill would come up immediately when this bill was disposed of.

Mr. YOUNG assenting to the arrangement, the bill was made the special order, and the hour of one having arrived, it was taken up, and

Mr. HUBBARD stating that the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. WRIGHT] being prevented from attending the Senate by the severe indisposition of his family, it had unexpectedly devolved upon him to explain the principles and provisions of the bill, which having done,

And after a debate, in which Messrs. WEBSTER, HUBBARD, SMITH of Indiana, BENTON, PRESTON, and BUCHANAN, participated, the bill was put upon its passage; and, on the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was decided in the affirmatives—ayes 25, noes 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, and Young—25.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, March 30, 1840.

Mr. KING of Georgia observed that his attention had been directed to a paragraph in the Georgia Constitutionalist, from which he learned that, in the list of yeas and nays on the final passage of the resolution admitting the New Jersey members to their seats, his name was omitted on the journal. He was certainly present in the House and voted on that occasion, and voted in the negative. He asked permission of the House, therefore, to have the journal corrected by the insertion of his name in the proper place.

Mr. CRAIG submitted to the gentleman whether it would not be better to submit to this slight inconvenience than to set a dangerous precedent. If the omission had occurred only a day or two ago, there would be no inconvenience in correcting the journal: but he thought that going so far back to make a correction would be liable to serious objections.

Mr. KING said a few words in reply; after which, the motion was agreed to, and the journal corrected accordingly.

Mr. WICK offered the following resolution, which, by general consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of attaching so much of the Miama Reserve in Indiana as has been purchased from the Indians to the proper land districts, dividing the same so as best to suit the convenience of purchasers, and report a bill accordingly.

This being the day set apart under the rule for the reception of petitions,

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the question on the appeal taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] from the decision of the CHAIR that the petition presented by that gentleman on praying that Florida should not be admitted into the Union so long as its Constitution tolerated the institution of slavery, came within the rule in relation to Abolition petitions, and could not be received.

Mr. ANDREWS said the time was when he should have been pleased to have an opportunity afforded him to discuss the question of Abolition; but as he was fully satisfied with the decision of the House upon this subject, and as a discussion would be very injurious to the public business, he moved the previous question on the appeal; which was seconded, and

The main question having been ordered, which was, "Shall the decision of the SPEAKER stand as the judgment of the House?" it was determined in the affirmative. So the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed.

The call of the States for petitions was continued, commencing with the State of New York, where the call was arrested on the last petition day; when Petitions were presented by Messrs. HOFFMAN, and on behalf of Mr. GRINNELL, FILLMORE, RUSSELL, HUNT, CHARLES JOHNSTON, CURTIS, CHITTENDEN, GATES, FINE, KEMBLE, MARVIN, MONROE, MORGAN, DOIG, STRONG, HAND, CHITTENDEN, FLOYD, LEONARD, KEMPSHALL, DANA, EARL, BREWSTER, and PALEN, of New York.

Mr. GATES presented a petition praying Congress to pass a law prohibiting the use of ardent spirits in the army and navy, and its sale in the Capitol.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to lay it on the table; which was disagreed to.

Mr. GATES moved to refer it to a Select Committee; which motion was lost, on a count—ayes 46, noes 67.

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. RAMSEY moved to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CROCKETT said, if it was in order, he would move to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order, inasmuch as the House had just refused to lay it on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD said he thought the House had enough to do, without converting the Congress of the nation into a temperance society. He hoped the petition would be disposed of summarily.

Mr. REED suggested that so much of it as related to the navy be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; so much as related to the army, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and so much as related to the sale of ardent spirits in the Capitol, be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. GATES gave his assent to the proposed disposition.

Mr. HUBBARD wished to know whether they had the constitutional power to organize the House into a temperance society.

The SPEAKER said, under the rule, the petition must lie over, having caused debate.

Mr. GATES presented petitions upon the subject of slavery; and he wished to have it entered on the journal that he had presented such petitions, and that the SPEAKER decided that, under the rule, they could not be received.

The SPEAKER said he could not make such entry on the journal. It had never been the practice to note propositions there which had not been received by the House.

Mr. ADAMS contended that it was a right sacred to every member, to present the petitions committed to their charge. The House could not, by any rule, deprive a member of the right to present any petition, and have the decision of the SPEAKER and the House upon it. To deny it would be to deprive a member of one of his most sacred rights under the Constitution.

Mr. CHAPMAN interrupted Mr. A. and inquired what was the subject before the House.

The CHAIR said he was under the impression that the gentleman from Massachusetts was going to take an appeal from his decision; if not, he was out of order.

Mr. ADAMS said he had taken an appeal on the last petition day, and it was to that he was speaking.

The CHAIR replied that that appeal had been decided, and the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed.

Mr. ADAMS said, then I will appeal again. I do not intend that the subject shall be passed on so unceremoniously. Mr. A. then appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

The SPEAKER cited decisions of his predecessors, which were sustained by a large vote of the House, that no notice should be taken on the journal of petitions which were not received under the rule.

Mr. ADAMS made some few further remarks in support of his appeal, contending that the decisions of the former Speaker were given under different rules and circumstances.

Mr. FINE said he had had in his possession for some time, many petitions which he had not been afforded an opportunity to present, and to effect that object and to save the time of the House, he would move the previous question.

The SPEAKER reiterated his decision that he could not entertain any motion in relation to petitions which were not received under the rule.

The previous question was then seconded; and the main question having been ordered, which main question was "shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were yeas 119, nays 29—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, John Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Craig, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, John W. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dellett, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earll, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Galbraith, Rice Garland, Griffin, Habersham, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, John Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, King, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Mitchell, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Paynter, Ramsey, Rhett, Edward Rogers, Jas. Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Simonton, Albert Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweney, Taliaferro, W. Thompson, J. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Weller, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Brockway, Calhoun, Chittenden, Curtis, Edwards, Everett, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Hall, Wm. S. Hastings, James, Kempshall, Lincoln, Morgan, C. Morris, Ogle, Palen, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Saltonstall, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Tillinghast, and Trumbull—29.

So the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

Mr. MARVIN presented a petition from sundry citizens of Cataraugus county, New York, praying that the House may rescind the rule for the non-reception of Abolition petitions; which Mr. M. moved to refer to a select committee.

Mr. BANKS moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. JAMES demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 84, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Burke, William O. Butler, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Doig, Dromgoole, Earll, Eastman, Fine, Fisher, Fornance, Galbraith, Graves, Griffin, Habersham, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hopkins, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leonard, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Pickens, Ramsey, Rhett, Robinson, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweney, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Vanderpoel, Vroom, John Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Chittenden, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Davee, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Floyd, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Hall, Hand, William S. Hastings, Henry, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lincoln, Lowell, Marvin, Morgan, C. Morris, Ogle, Osborne, Parmenter, Peck, Randall, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Storrs, Tillinghast, Trumbull, Underwood, Thomas W. Williams, and Henry Williams—49.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition praying for the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIR decided that it could not be received under the rule.

Mr. MORGAN read the rule, and contended that there was nothing in the rule which related to the slave trade in the District of Columbia, though it referred to the slave trade in the Territories.

Mr. ADAMS was of the same opinion, and took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. GIDDING was going on to debate the merits of the question of slavery, when

Mr. COOPER of Georgia called him to order. He was debating the merits of slavery, instead of endeavoring to show that the rule was not applicable to petitions praying the abolition of the slave trade in the District. He hoped he would be confined strictly to the question before the House.

Mr. GIDDINGS then proceeded to show that the District of Columbia was not a Territory; and that the rule for that reason did not include petitions of the above character. He further endeavored to show that the rule was so constructed as studiously to avoid touching the question of the abolition of the slave trade in this District, and was again discussing the demerits of the slave question, when

Mr. COOPER of Georgia again called him to order.

Mr. GIDDINGS made some observation which was not heard by the Reporter; for which

Mr. WELLER called him to order; when

Mr. GRIFFIN of South Carolina objected to his proceeding further in his remarks; and

The SPEAKER requested the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. G.] to take his seat.

Mr. CRAIG thought his duty to his constituents and the country imperiously demanded of him to put a stop to such a waste of time in unprofitable discussion; he therefore moved the previous question, which was seconded; and the main question ordered, which main question was,

"Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 93, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beaty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cross, Davee, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Doig, Dromgoole, Eastman, Fine, Floyd, Fornace, Griffin, Habersham, Hand, Hawkins, John Hill of Va. John Hill of N. C. Hillen, Holleman, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, King, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Nisbet, Parmenter, Paynter, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Robinson, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sweney, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Chittenden, Cranston, Cushing, Everett, Fletcher, Giddings, Goode, Hall, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hunt, James, Kempshall, Lincoln, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Randall, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Storrs, Tillinghast, and Trumbull—33.

So the decision of the SPEAKER was confirmed.

[Mr. EARLL presented the petition of George Leach, of Onondaga county, in the State of New York. The petitioner states that Charles Burzette was a soldier in the war of the Revolution; that he was a pensioner, and died, leaving a widow; that his widow applied to the War Department for the bounty land to which her late husband was entitled; that the Department decided that, by the law of descents of the State of New York, she was not entitled to the land. The petitioner further states that he married the granddaughter of the said widow, and has expended money in the supporting of the said widow, from whom he has an assignment for the said bounty land. The petitioner asks Congress to pass a law securing to him the said bounty. Mr. E. moved his reference to the Committee on Private Land Claims: it was so referred. Mr. E. also presented the petition of Erasmus Stone and 76 other citizens of the county of Onondaga, in New York, setting forth the necessity of having a general bankrupt law by Congress, so as to produce uniformity in all parts of the United States. The petitioners also urge several reasons calling for the immediate action of Congress: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Also, the petition of William Sabin and 52 other citizens of the county of Onondaga, in the State of New York, and observed that the petitioners assert that the use of intoxicating drinks for persons in health are unnecessary and injurious; that considering the temptations which beset officers, soldiers, and sailors, in the army and navy, removed from the restraints of society, to indulge in such drinks, and the facility with which the aborigines of this country form intemperate appetites; and believing that any legislation which would exclude such drinks from the navy and army, while such drinks are permitted to be sold in the Capitol of the nation, involves an apparent inconsistency between precept and example. The petitioners ask that an act may be passed at the present session of Congress prohibiting the furnishing of any such drinks to the army, navy, or Indians, within the jurisdiction of the United States; and that the duty on all imported intoxicating drinks be increased; and also prohibiting such sales at the Capitol at Washington, or at or near any military or naval depot under the jurisdiction of the United States; and that every other means within the constitutional control of Congress may be used to discourage the manufacture of such drinks in the United States. Mr. E. moved its reference to the Committee on Manufactures: it was so referred.]

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The resolution submitted some time since by Mr. LUMPKIN, fixing the adjournment of Congress on the 18th of May, being taken up,

Mr. LUMPKIN hoped that a vote might be taken on the resolution. His own opinion on the subject was unchanged, and he believed, as he had formerly taken occasion to say, that the business of the country would be greatly accelerated if a definite day was fixed for the adjournment. He was aware that a majority of the Senate differed with him as to the time mentioned; but if it was too early, the resolution might be amended so as to fix it at a more remote day; but he hoped that some day would be designated.

Mr. NORVELL thought that Congress could not with propriety fix a day for adjournment until intelligence was received of the action of the British Government on the propositions submitted to her in relation to the boundary question. With a view, however, of disposing of this matter for the present, he would move that the resolution, with the bill, introduced by him some days since, fixing the day of meeting for the next session, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No one appearing to object, the question was about being put, when

Mr MOUTON observed that he considered it a very singular direction to give this resolution, and he was very much surprised that his friend from Georgia [Mr. LUMPKIN] should acquiesce in it, as he considered it equivalent to a rejection of the resolution.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he was compelled to yield to what he could not avoid. His friend from Louisiana and himself had the same opinion on this subject, but the majority of the Senate thought differently, and they had the power to give any direction to the resolution they thought proper. He had endeavored repeatedly to get a direct vote on his proposition, and had even asked it as a personal favor; but it was not thought proper to grant his request, and he bowed to the will of the majority. He therefore hoped his friend from Louisiana would perceive that there was no ground for b ing surprised in the fact of his yielding when he could not help it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he agreed with the Senator from Georgia on this subject, and had voted with him throughout His legislative experience, which was not short, had taught him that seldom was there a determined purpose evinced to transact the business of Congress until a day was fixed for the close of the session. As to this question of the Northeastern boundary, the British Government last July (he spoke from recollection) submitted a proposition to this Government for its settlement. This not proving satisfactory, our Government submitted to the British Government a counter projet, to which, as yet, no answer has been received. He was very glad to learn from the communication of the British Minister, which was read in this body on Thursday last, though he did not like the temper displayed in that paper, that an answer might be shortly expected. When the expected answer to our counter projet is received, we will see daylight on this question. We will then be informed whether the British Government accedes to the proposition, and is disposed to settle it amicably, or whether she refuses, and in that event we will know what we have to do. He was not willing to vote for fixing the 18th of May as the day of adjournment, but he thought that in all human probability the reply of the British Government would be received before the first of June. Should that answer be unpropitious, which Heaven forbid, we can postpone it until such measures can be passed as we may deem necessary for the protection of the country.

Mr. LUMPKIN having acceded to the modification of his resolution, as suggested by Mr. BUCHANAN,

Mr. ALLEN said he would vote against the resolution under consideration, or any other proposing to fix a day for the adjournment of Congress, in the present state of our foreign relations. He would consider a vote fixing a day of adjournment, at the present moment, when we are in expectation of the receipt of important intelligence from Great Britain, as equivalent to a declaration that we deemed the anticipated answer of the British Government as of no moment, whereas that answer might involve us in the most serious difficulties with that power.

Mr. BENTON said he was opposed to acting on this question of adjournment at the present time. He was one of those who anxiously desired peace—peace with all nations; but he was also of opinion, that to preserve peace we should show to the world that we were prepared to defend ourselves. And he was also of opinion that the manner in which we had squandered the public money among the several States, had encouraged a foreign nation to push us to a point. Our immense frontier, embracing an extent of not less than six thousand miles, as is generally known, is in as defenceless a condition as could be wished by an enemy. It was even, in some respects, in a worse situation than at the commencement of the last war with Great Britain. To be sure, we had some fortifications; but many of them were without armaments, and defenceless, and could be taken possession of by an enemy, and made a means of annoyance to us, instead of defence. They would be turned against us, instead of being useful against our enemies. The Senate some days since passed a resolution which was offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] calling on the Secretary of War for such information as he possessed relative to warlike preparations by a neighboring nation on the Northern and Northeastern frontier. The reply to that resolution has not yet been received, but every Senator is aware that extensive preparations are going on along the whole line of our Northern frontier—from Lake Superior to Passamaquoddy bay. That along this whole line, the British Government are not only constructing permanent fortifications, which every nation has an unquestioned right to do, but that she is also constructing field works, which imply approaching operations, and which, under the laws of nations, we had a right to demand what occasion they were intended for. But we need not confine our observation to our Northern frontier for signs of warlike preparation, but we may look to the mouth of the Columbia, that important portion of our territory which my friend and colleague [Mr. LINN] so appropriately and perseveringly endeavors to turn our attention to. Not only to the mouth of that important river, but to the Bermudas, may our attention be turned to the warlike preparations that are being made. We can also point to the Bahamas—to the greatly increased facility of communication between Great Britain and Halifax—to the concentration of troops in provinces bordering on our frontier; all exhibited evidences of preparing for a state of hostilities.

Mr. President, it is time that we cease plundering our country, and begin to defend it. The miserable business of dividing surplus revenue and land revenue, should be scouted from our councils. The armor of defence is what the nation should wear. If we wish to preserve peace, we must show a will to resist aggression. The nation which refuses to defend itself invites aggression. The dark clouds are gathering around us. We see them far above the horizon, North, South, East and West. Great Britain prepares at all points; we remain supine; Congress remains supine. All the admonitions of the late and present Administrations to prepare in peace for war, have been disregarded; and now we are taunted with our defenceless state. At the last session of Congress, resolutions requiring the heads of the War and Navy Departments to submit plans for the general and permanent defence for the country, were sent from this chamber. One of these Departments has answered this resolution; the other is preparing it. When they come in, we shall see what the general and permanent defence of the country requires; we shall have a general plan to discuss. In the meantime, impending events may require accelerated action: and he was not for adjourning, or even discussing the question of adjournment, until these events were further developed. While the question with England wore its present aspect, he deemed it neither wise nor politic to discuss an adjournment. It would look like saying we would do nothing to defend ourselves, and thereby would encourage and embolden the power whose preparations now menace us. It would operate as an encouragement to Great Britain to continue to push us—to continue to press and bear upon us; and from that pressure, collision and explosion might ensue. He was for deferring the question of adjournment until the public business was attended to, and especially until the question with England changed its aspect.

Mr. TAPPAN moved that the resolution be laid upon the table, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. NORVELL, who wished to be informed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether it was the intention of the committee to report, at a day not very remote, a bill for the defence of the country.

Mr. BENTON said an answer to this question was intended in his previous remarks. The committee had delayed their action, until a report from one of the Departments, which was expected at an early day, should be received.

After some remarks from Mr. PRENTISS in favor of the resolution:

Mr. LINN said, as his constituents had a right to know his reasons for voting against this resolution, he would briefly state them. If he was asked will Congress be ready to adjourn on the 1st of June, he would answer in the negative.

Mr. L. then adverted to the amount of private business before them, and said that, independent of any extraneous matters, and leaving entirely out of view the threatening aspect of our foreign relations adverted to by his colleague, [Mr. BENTON,] it was not probable they would be ready for adjournment at the time designated. Let us, said Mr. L. industriously set about doing the business before us, and when we see our way through it, let us then fix a day for adjournment.

Mr. TALLMADGE spoke at some length in opposition to the resolution. It was fixing a day much earlier than usual, when, owing to peculiar circumstances in the other branch of Congress, the public business was several weeks behind its usual state of forwardness at this period of the session. He was for remaining here until the public business was perfected, or otherwise all the time spent in maturing it would go for nothing. He alluded to the necessity of passing a bankrupt law, which had been so loudly called for by the community, and on which there was such a perfect unanimity of sentiment. He was willing to remain here until all the business that was before them was perfected and disposed of, and he considered that to be the true economy.

The question was then taken on laying the resolution on the table, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 23, noes 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Cuthbert, Grundy, Linn, Merrick, Norvell, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Preston Roane, Robinson, Rugeles, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, Wright and Young—23

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Prentiss, Sevier, and Southard—17.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was then taken up, the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, to strike out the two per cent. clause.

Mr. WRIGHT addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the amendment, and was followed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama and PHELPS, in reply, and Mr. SMITH of Indiana in support of the bill.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky proposed a modification of the amendment of Mr. CLAY of Alabama; pending the consideration of which,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, March 31, 1840.

After an ineffectual attempt on the part of Mr. BRIGGS to amend the journal,

Mr. ADAMS rose and said that he had a request to make of the House, in consequence of a letter which he received yesterday from the Secretary of the Treasury. The letter was short, and he desired that it might be read, as the House would then be the better enabled to understand and judge of the propriety of the request he was about to make.

The letter was then read.

Mr. ADAMS then observed that the bill referred to in the letter of the Secretary, was reported by the Committee on Manufactures on the 5th March last, [No. 100,] to insure the more faithful execution of the laws in relation to the collection of duties on imports. The object was to suppress and prevent some of those numerous frauds on the revenue, of which there had been so much complaint, and with which the Administration of the Government had so much cause to be dissatisfied. He did ask the House, at the time he reported this bill, to make it the special order for some certain day. This the House did not think proper then to grant. He now took the first moment after receiving the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, to make the same request; and he would propose to make the bill the special order for this day fortnight, to take precedence over all other business.

Mr. POPE suggested whether it would not be better for the gentleman to fix on some earlier day.

Mr. ADAMS replied that it would be more agreeable to him to fix on this day week, if such was the pleasure of the House.

Mr. CONNER would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts to except the appropriation bills in giving this bill the precedence over all other business. Although he admitted that this was an important measure, yet it was not more so than the bills providing for carrying on the operations of the Government, and should not take precedence over them. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, he understood, intended to ask the House to take up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill to-day, and it was very well known that appropriations for this branch of the public service was now wanted, and that the claims of some individuals had even been protested.

Mr. RHETT urged the great necessity of acting on the navy appropriation bill.

Mr. ADAMS objected to excepting the appropriation bills, because it was known to all that when they came up, they generally gave rise to debates, lasting three or four weeks. He wished to state that he made his motion in consequence of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and from a sincere desire to accommodate those who have the administration of the affairs of the country, in relation to the execution of their appropriate duties, and more especially in relation to the raising of a certain revenue for the wants of the Government. He was perfectly willing to take this day week, and that would give time enough to enable the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to bring up the appropriation bills.

Mr. CONNER moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts by adding the words "with the exception of the appropriation bills;" the effect of the amendment being to give the bill the preference over all other business, with the exception of appropriation bills.

Mr. EVERETT inquired of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether, in his opinion, the bill would give rise to debate?

Mr. ADAMS apprehended that a bill of this importance could not pass without some discussion. With respect to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, if it should be the pleasure House to pass it, he would acquiesce, but he apprehended that it would virtually defeat the proposition; for if the appropriation bills were once taken up, a debate of perhaps weeks would ensue, and the objects of the Administration in regard to this bill would be defeated. Such should not be the case with his consent.

Mr. CONNER was aware of the importance of this bill, but every gentleman knew that it would occupy as much time in debate as one of the appropriation bills. Mr. C. insisted on the propriety of his amendment, as the appropriation bills were of more importance to the country than the one under consideration, important as it was.

The question was taken on Mr. CONNER'S amendment, and it was adopted—ayes 78, noes 53.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to make the bill the special order for two o'clock to-day; but after some objections from Mr. DROMGOOLE, withdrew his motion.

Mr. ADAMS then modified his motion so as to make the bill be order of the day for this day week, which motion, as amended, was agreed to—ayes 83, noes 41.

The following is extracted from the Intelligencer's report of yesterday's proceedings:

Mr. W. THOMPSON obtained leave to make a brief personal explanation—portions only of which were heard by the Reporter with any think like distinctness. The following statement of the explanation and reply, as written out by Mr. T. were handed to the Reporter by that gentleman for publication:

Mr. W. THOMPSON said that he had announced, a few days since, that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] should be in his seat, he desired a few moments indulgence of the House in a matter personal to himself. Mr. T. had seen in the Globe that which purported to be the remarks of Mr. DUNCAN, in which there were inaccuracies of statements of his (Mr. T's) arguments, accompanied with grossly offensive personal remarks. Mr. T. had heard the speech of the honorable member, and had not heard any such language as is attributed to him. He has since read the speech of the gentleman as reported by himself, and there is not only nothing like the language reported in the Globe, but nothing to which Mr. T. has any right to take exception. Mr. T. was glad it was so. The misstatement is the act, not of the gentleman from Ohio, but of one of the Reporters on that bench—no, not Reporters, but habitual falsifiers of the debates in this House.

Mr. DUNCAN said the gentleman was rather too harsh upon the reporters. He may have used some such expressions, but if he did, they were so qualified as to make them unexceptionable.

Mr. T. read the following passage from the Globe, and asked if the gentleman had used that language?

"One of those charges was made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] that neither the President in his message, nor the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, had intimated that there would be any deficit in the Treasury, or any necessity for the issue of these Treasury notes. The gentleman made this charge when he had these documents in his hand, commenting upon them. Now this charge was without foundation, and the gentleman must have known it."

Mr. DUNCAN replied. If I did, it was with such qualifications as to have made them unexceptionable, and without any imputation upon the gentleman from South Carolina.

In addition to the above remarks of Mr. THOMPSON as written out by himself for the Intelligencer, he also said, that

"The report was made by one of the persons sitting on that bench, [pointing to the bench occupied by the Globe Reporters] hired libellers, who are not reporters of our proceedings, but falsifiers of our proceedings, and incapable of speaking the truth on any occasion. I feel that I degrade myself by noticing them, and would not have done so but for the circumstances of the case."*

The SPEAKER then announced the business before the House to be the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] to discharge the Committee of Elections from the further consideration of certain papers, on the motion of the chairman to print the report of the committee.

Mr. MEDILL, who had the floor, continued his remarks in defence of the report, until the expiration of the morning hour; when

Mr. MORGAN of New York moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. CAMPBELL hoped the House would go on with the business before it, and endeavor to bring the question to a final decision.

Mr. BELL had no objection, if the gentleman could conclude within a reasonable time.

Mr. MORGAN insisting on his motion, the yeas and nays were asked and ordered.

Mr. DAWSON hoped this question of the New Jersey election would be disposed of as soon as possible, that the House might proceed to the consideration of the public business, and that he might have an opportunity to offer a resolution similar to that which had been offered by his colleague in another branch of the Legislature, providing for the adjournment of Congress on a particular day.

Mr. PROFFIT called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and roll having been called over, the question was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 70.

So the House determined on proceeding to the orders of the day.

The Senate bills on the SPEAKER'S table were then severally taken up and referred; after which,

The bill to secure the freedom of elections, and to prevent

*The Reporter who made the brief synopsis of the remarks of Mr. DUNCAN, of which that gentleman did not complain, cannot consent, as an American citizen, (though he may be compelled to submit as a Reporter,) to have his character assailed in consideration of the poor privilege of being permitted to hold a seat in the hall, more frequently than otherwise to report the outpourings of abuse upon himself. However humble that gentleman may consider the Reporter, and though he may aristocratically assume that he degrades himself by noticing him, he is willing, where he is known, to compare character with that dignified gentleman—whether moral or political—and leave it to the public to judge to which his language is most applicable, and which could the most easily be bent to the purposes of a "hired libeller and habitual falsifier, incapable of speaking the truth on any occasion."

Persons who attend the Hall of Representatives, and who are witnesses of the confusion, which at times prevails, may reality imagine with what difficulty the Reporter can hear the speaker, however acute his sense of hearing. It is frequently, almost impossible for the Reporters to apprehend the remarks of members. The Reporters of the Globe have always held themselves bound, as they now do, to make prompt correction of any errors which they may have committed, or may hereafter commit. It certainly would be more magnanimous to the Reporters, if not more decorous to the House, for gentlemen to call upon them and demand (if there be necessity for demand) that they should correct their errors, instead of consuming the time of the House, and causing the delay of the public business, by entertaining the galleries in indecorous, malignant, and uncharitable denunciation against individuals, who have not the poor privilege of repelling it on the spot in a becoming manner, however unfounded or illiberal those charges might be. And how much more would it show a want of magnanimity in a gentleman armed with the tremendous powers of the Constitution—and in whom, perchance, was the embodiment of all the chivalry of the House—for the purpose of attracting the admiring gaze of the galleries, to swagger forth, conscious of his giant powers, and "degrade" himself by attacking a puny and defenceless Reporter! Laurels gained in a contest, under such circumstances, would, methinks, wither on the brow of the assailant before he returned to his constituency.

W. W. C. reporter.

It is known, in the House of Representatives, that there are two Reporters for the Globe, and the one who did not make the report to which Mr. W. THOMPSON takes exception, only feels it necessary to repel, with scorn, the charge that was made equally against both Reporters; and he calls upon the honorable gentleman to point out how, when, and where, he ever libelled or misrepresented any body, or made a false report of the proceedings of the House.

The gentleman, in stating that he felt himself degraded by noticing the Reporters for the Globe, did not make himself sufficiently intelligible. If he assumed a superiority in rank, it is only necessary to reply, that the day has gone by when aristocratical distinctions could be tolerated in this country. The Reporter is a citizen of the United States; and a member of Congress is nothing more. If he assumed a superiority in virtue and intellect, the ready reply is: that is a matter for the public, and not for the gentleman himself to decide upon.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, April 1, 1840.

Mr DAVIS presented a memorial from J. J. Robertson, praying that the children of American foreign missionaries, born abroad, may be accounted native American citizens; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of the heirs of John Chalmers, praying compensation for property destroyed by the enemy during the last war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

the interference of Federal officers therein, was taken up; and

Mr. BELL addressed the House at great length in its support.

Mr. B. however, before finishing, gave way at the earnest solicitation of Mr. CURTIS, Mr. REED, Mr. SALTONSTALL, and other gentlemen, for a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Senate bill to remit the penalties paid by vessels engaged in the whale fishery, and to legalize their registers, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment.

No opposition was made to the bill. The amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, reported to the House, when it was read a third time, and passed forthwith.

Mr. BELL then resumed the floor, but, after occupying it for a very short time, yielded to a motion for adjournment.

And thereupon, the House adjourned.

Mr. WEBSTER said he held in his hand six memorials from inhabitants of Ohio, on the subject of domestic slavery, which he supposed would take the usual course of such petitions.

The question of reception was, on motion by Mr. KING, laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial, signed by a large number of citizens of Boston, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. said, that with permission of the Senate, he would now ask leave to bring in the bill on this subject, of which he gave notice two or three days since. He did not wish to be understood as intending to interfere with the labors of the committee who had this subject before them. He had devoted considerable attention to this matter, and had examined the various British statutes in relation to it, and had endeavored to frame a bill which would combine the desirable qualities of brevity, cheapness, and despatch. The bill consisted of thirteen sections, which were not long, and were very simple in their provisions. They embrace the cases of voluntary bankruptcy and involuntary bankruptcy, and thought that it would ensure the cheap and speedy distribution of the assets. If the bill met the approbation of the committee to which it would be referred, it would give him much pleasure; if they thought it needed amendment, they would of course amend it; and if its only effect would be to assist the labors of the committee in perfecting a bill, he would be satisfied, his great object being to further the progress of the measure. He moved that the bill be read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL said that he was gratified that the Senator from Massachusetts had introduced his promised bill, and he would beg leave to ask the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] if he was prepared to introduce the bill of which he had given notice. There could be but one object in relation to this measure, and that was to have it as perfect as possible. He hoped that the bill submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts might be printed, so that Senators might have their attention directed to the subject before they were called upon to act on it.

Mr TALLMADGE made some remarks in reply, but in so low a tone as not to be heard by the Reporter. He was understood to say, however, that he would in a few days ask leave to introduce a bill on the subject.

The bill was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIERCE presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Concord, N. H. praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law;

Mr. WHITE presented a similar memorial from citizens of Laporte, Indiana;

Mr. YOUNG presented a similar memorial from citizens of Galena, Illinois;

Mr. WRIGHT presented a similar memorial from citizens of Fulton county, New York;

Mr. NORVELL presented a similar memorial from citizens of Michigan; which were severally referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. YOUNG presented a document containing a statistical description of the town of Galena; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Y. also presented a memorial of citizens of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial of inhabitants of the counties of Kalamazoo and St. Josephs, Michigan, praying for a modification of the pre-emption law; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to endeavor to procure an appropriation for a light-house at the mouth of Bayou Bonfonca, on Lake Pontchartrain; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial of Mathew Winslow and others, praying remuneration for errors in land surveys; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. ALLEN said he wished to make a few remarks, to which he invited the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Senate was aware that the charters of the various banks in the District expired by limitation on the 4th of July next. On the 6th of January last, memorials were presented asking for a recharter of those banks, since which nearly three months have passed; and as there has been no report from the committee, indicative of their intentions on the subject, and as the session is very far advanced, he desired to give the chairman of the committee an opportunity of stating whether or not a report on the subject might be expected at an early day, or whether the committee intended to take any action on the memorials. He would only add that if a bill was reported to recharter these banks it would probably excite considerable discussion. The recharter of the banks of this District, looking at it merely as confined to the District, was comparatively unimportant; but he looked at it as connected with the great struggle now going on in this country between corporations and individuals, and our discussions of and determination on the subject here, would have a powerful influence on the destinies of the nation, whether for good or evil. It was with this view of its importance he had felt it his duty to ask for information on the intentions of the committee.

Mr. MERRICK stated that the committee had given to this question of rechartering the banks of the District all the attention it was in their power to bestow; and he would inform the Senator from Ohio, and the Senate generally, that the committee had a bill in an advanced state of preparation to renew, or extend at least, the charters of the banks of the District, and a report might be expected in two or three days at farthest. The delay adverted to by the Senator from Ohio, was occasioned by the anxiety of the committee to have as full and as perfect an understanding of the condition and resources of the banks as it was possible to obtain, and to have the advantage of all the developments that might occur. He would repeat that the Senate would, in the course of two or three days, have the views of the committee presented to them, and would have a full opportunity of discussing their propriety.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, the bill to cancel the bonds given, and remit the penalties paid, by vessels engaged in the whale fishery, as amended by the House, was taken up for consideration, and the amendment was concurred in.

On motion by Mr. MOUTON, the bill to confirm claims to lands in the district between the Rio Hondo and Sabine rivers, was taken up, and after being considered, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, the bill for the relief of Jacob Greaves was taken up, and after being discussed, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the difficulties which have existed, and the arrangements made, or attempted to be made, between the Government and the Cherokee Indians; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY AND NAVAL PREPARATIONS ON OUR NORTHERN FRONTIER.

The CHAIR submitted the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate:

I communicate to the Senate, in compliance with their resolution of the 12th instant, a report from the Secretary of War, containing information on the subject of that resolution.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 28th March, 1840.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
March 27, 1840.

SIR: The resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, "That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if, in his judgment, compatible with the public interest, any information which may be in the possession of the Government, or which can be conveniently obtained, of the military and naval preparations of the British authorities on the Northern frontier of the United States, from Lake Superior to the Atlantic ocean; designating the permanent from the temporary and field works, and particularly by noting those which are within the claimed limits of the United States;" having been referred by you to this Department, it was immediately referred to Major General Scott, and other officers who have been stationed on the frontier referred to, for such information on the subject as they possessed, and could readily procure; and an examination is now in progress for such as may be contained in the files of this Department. General Scott is the only officer yet heard from; and a copy of his report is herewith submitted, together with a copy of that to which he refers, made upon the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant. As soon as the other officers who have been called upon, are heard from, and the examination of the files of the Department is completed, any further information which may be thus acquired will be immediately laid before you.

Very respectfully,
Your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

HEAD QUARTERS EASTERN DIVISION,
Elizabethtown, N. J. March 23, 1840.

SIR: I have received from your office copies of two resolutions, passed, respectively, the 12th and 9th instant, one by the Senate, and the other by the House of Representatives; and I am asked for "any information on the subject of both, or either of the resolutions, that may be in [my] possession"

In respect to the naval force recently maintained upon the American lakes by Great Britain, I have just had the honor to report to the Secretary of War, by whom the resolution of the House of Representatives (of the 9th instant) was directly referred to me.

I now confine myself to the Senate's resolution, respecting "military [I omit naval] preparations of the British authorities on the Northern frontiers of the United States, from Lake Superior to the Atlantic ocean, distinguishing the permanent from the temporary and field works, and particularly noting those which are within the claimed limits of the United States."

I will here remark that, however well my duties have made me acquainted with the greater part of the line in question, I have paid but slight attention to the forts and barracks erected by the British authorities near the borders of Maine, above Fredericton, in New Brunswick, or in Upper Canada, above Cornwall, being of the fixed opinion (which need not here be developed) that all such structures would be of little or no military value to either of the parties in the event of a new war between the United States and Great Britain.

I was, last summer, at the foot of Lake Superior, and neither saw nor heard of any British fort or barrack on the St. Mary's river, the outlet of that lake.

Between Lakes Huron and Erie, the British have three sets of barracks: one at Windsor, opposite to Detroit; one at Sandwich, a little lower down; and the third at Malden, eighteen miles from the first; all built of sawed logs, strengthened by blockhouses, loopholes, &c. Malden has long been a military post, with slight defences. These have been recently strengthened. The works at Sandwich and Windsor have, also, I think, been erected within the last six or eight months.

Near the mouth of the Niagara the British have two small forts--George and Messisanga. Both existed during the last war. The latter may be termed a permanent work. Slight barracks have been erected within the last two years, on the same side, near the Falls and at Chippewa, with breastworks at the latter place; but nothing, I believe, above the works first named, on the Niagara, which can be termed a fort.

Since the commencement of recent troubles in the Canadas, and (consequent thereupon) within our limits, Fort William Henry at Kingston and Fort Wellington, opposite to Ogdensburg, (old works,) have both been strengthened, within themselves, besides the addition of dependencies. These forts may be called permanent.

On the St. Lawrence, below Prescott, and confronting our territory, I know of no other military post. Twelve miles above, at Brockville, there may be temporary barracks and breastworks. I know that of late, Brockville has been a military station.

In the system of defences on the approaches to Montreal, the Isle Aux Noix, a few miles below our line, and in the outlet of lake Champlain, stands at the head. This island contains within itself a system of permanent works of great strength. On them the British Government has, from time to time, since the peace of 1815, expended much skill and labor.

Odletown, near our line, on the western side of lake Champlain, has been a station for a body of Canadian militia, for two years, to guard the neighborhood from refugee incendiaries from our side. I think that barracks have been erected there for the accommodation of those troops, and also at a station, with the like object, near Alburgh, in Vermont.

It is believed that there are no important British forts, or extensive British barracks, on our borders, from Vermont to Maine.

In respect to such structures on on the disputed territory, Governor Fairfield's published letters contain fuller information than has reached me through any other channel. I have heard of no new military preparations by the British authorities on the St Croix or Passamaquoddy bay.

Among such preparations, perhaps I ought not to omit the fact that Great Britain, besides numerous corps of well organized and well instructed militia, has, at this time, within her North American provinces, more than 20,000 of her best regular troops. The whole of those forces might be brought to the verge of our territory in a few days. Two-thirds of that regular force has arrived out since the spring of 1838.

I remain sir, with great respect,
Your most obedient servant,
WINFIELD SCOTT.

Brig. Gen. R. JONES, Adjutant General U. S. A.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was then taken up, the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, to strike out the two per cent. clause.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky proposed a modification of the amendment; which being accepted by Mr. CLAY of Alabama,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky addressed the Senate in favor of the amendment; and the question being taken thereon, it was rejected—ayes 17, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, King, Lumpkin, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, and Webster—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Nicholas, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, White, Wright, and Young—19.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then proposed, as an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert the following as a substitute:

"That the two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands in the several States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, which may accrue after the passage of this act, and which was reserved by the several acts for the admission of said several States into the Union, to be applied to the laying out and construction of roads leading to the said States respectively, be, and the same is hereby, relinquished to said State respectively, to be paid over to such person or persons as may be authorized to receive the same, to be applied by said States respectively, to such roads or canals within their several limits, as they think proper: Provided the Legislatures of each of said States shall, before receiving any part of the said fund, pass an act, irrevocable without the consent of Congress, assenting to the provisions of this act."

Mr. C. advocated his amendment at length, and was followed in the debate by Messrs. PRESTON, YOUNG, WEBSTER, CALHOUN, and WHITE; when, without taking a question,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, April 1, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the question before the House was the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. R. GARLAND] to discharge the Committee of Elections from the consideration of certain testimony.

Mr. MEDILL, who had the floor, resumed his remarks in support of the report of the committee of elections, and having concluded before the expiration of the morning hour—

Mr. FILLMORE rose to address the House in reply.

Mr. BELL rose and said that as the morning hour had nearly expired, it would be better for the gentleman to postpone his remarks till to-morrow, and that he [Mr. B.] should go on in continuation of his speech on the bill to secure the freedom of elections.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was perfectly satisfied to give way to the gentleman, provided that there was an understanding that he could have the floor to morrow.

Mr. CUSHING said he could not consent to any arrangement which would protract a discussion that had already lasted too long. If the gentleman from New York wished to speak, he desired that he should go on and enable the subject to be disposed of. He thought that some of the other States besides the State of New Jersey, should be heard on that floor, on subjects of interest to them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired if the gentleman had not already spoken twice on this subject; and whether he was not entitled to the floor.

Mr. CUSHING said it was evident that, if this discussion and recrimination was to go on, it would consume the morning hour for months, and would be extended ad infinitum.

Mr. FILLMORE then addressed the House a short time, and gave way,

When explanations were made by Messrs. RANDOLPH MEDILL, CAMPBELL of South Carolina, and FILLMORE, which latter gentleman was on the floor when

Mr. SMITH of Maine called for the orders of the day; before passing to which, however,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th ult. relative to the plan proposed to be adopted by him for the defence of the Western frontier; also, what tribes of Indians inhabit the country immediately west of Arkansas and Missouri.

On motion of Mr. BELL,

Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

2. Depositions in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER said that the first business in order was the bill to preserve the freedom of, and to prevent the interference of the Federal officers, in elections; and the question being, Shall the bill be read the first time?

Mr. BELL, who was still entitled to the floor on the above question, at half past five o'clock concluded his remarks explanatory of the provisions of the bill, and showing the great importance of some legislation upon the subject to which it relates.

Mr. WATTERSON then obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. WELLER, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, April 2, 1840.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the memorial of Preston Starrit, who states that a bank on which a check had been given him as remuneration on a contract, had stopped payment before he could present it, and praying relief; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NORVELL moved that the message received from the President yesterday, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. N. the papers in relation to the claim of John Nantz, were withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred House bill for the relief of George Willis, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LUMPKIN offered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of dividing the district of Georgia into two judicial districts of the United States.

Mr. NICHOLAS offered the following resolutions, which were severally considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving a more perfect organization to the Navy, by creating the rank of Admiral, and limiting, by law, the number of officers in the several existing ranks.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of dispensing with the usual appropriation for defraying the expense of the Board of Visiters to the Military Academy.

Various unfavorable reports from committees were taken up, and concurred in.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were taken up on their third reading, read a third time, and passed, viz:

The bill to confirm claims to lands in the district between the Rio Hondo and Sabine rivers; and

The bill for the relief of Jacob Greaves.

The bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation in the State of Alabama, after being amended, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed; for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances; and to abolish the office of Solicitor of the General Land Office, was taken up, the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, which was in effect to strike out "Solicitor" and insert "Recorder."

Mr. CLAY of Alabama addressed the Senate in favor of, and Mr. KING in opposition to, the amendment, when, on motion of Mr. WHITE, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was then taken up, the question being on the substitute proposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama yesterday.

Mr. WHITE addressed the Senate at much length in favor of the bill, and in opposition to the amendment, and was replied to by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, Mr. LUMPKIN, and Mr. ROANE.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, CLAY of Alabama, ANDERSON, and PIERCE; when

The question was taken on the substitute, and it was rejected, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Dixon, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, and Ruggles—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Webster, White, Wright, and Young—26.

Mr. GRUNDY said that, as the season would be far advanced before this bill would be finally acted on in the House, and as the amount appropriated could not be profitably expended the present season, he moved to reduce the sum in each State from $150 000 to $100,000.

Mr. PRESTON moved as an amendment to the amendment that "$100,000" be stricken out, and "$75 000" inserted.

The question was then taken on Mr. PRESTON's amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes 23, noes 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Strange, Webster, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Grundy, Henderson, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, White, and Young—17.

The question then being about to be put on the engrossment of the bill,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky intimated his wish to address the Senate on the bill, and on his motion

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 2, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the report of the Select Committee on Printing.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired if he had not the floor on the New Jersey case.

The SPEAKER replied that the report of the select committee was the special order.

Mr. R. GARLAND (one of the committee) said that he did not see the chairman in his place, and he could not say what his views were on the subject of taking up the report to-day. The documents were not yet printed, and it would be impossible to go on and make the necessary explanations without them. He could not tell when these documents would come from the printer; and he did not like to assign a day for the consideration of this subject, under the circumstances he had adverted to.

Mr. FISHER said he understood that the papers had only been sent down to the printer yesterday.

Mr. R. GARLAND said, if the House would only pass over the business informally, by general consent, till the chairman came in, they could then ascertain from him how the printing of the documents was progressing.

Mr. BLACK (chairman of the committee) could only say that the report he had had the honor to submit to the House, was given to the printer as soon as he made it to the House; but that the documents connected with it, comprising a large body of testimony, was not given to him till yesterday. Wherefore, he could not say; but the printer, of course, was not to blame for the delay. There was a considerable volume of testimony, which the committe was for a long time engaged in preparing, and perhaps it took the clerk of the committee some time to arrange the documents for the press. He hoped the House would not object to giving a little more time to the printer to execute the work.

Mr WISE suggested to the chairman to name a day for the consideration of the report, when the printing might be expected to be brought in—say Tuesday next.

Mr. BLACK was not in correspondence with the printer, and could not tell more than any other member when the work would be done.

Mr. ADAMS informed the gentleman from Virginia that Tuesday next was assigned for the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures to prevent frauds on the revenue.

Mr. WISE then named Wednesday next, to which Mr. BLACK assented.

Mr. R. GARLAND inquired of the chairman of the committee whether he was prepared to report on that branch of the subject committed to them which related to the separation of the public printing from the political press. It was desirable, he said, to have the whole subject referred to the committee, considered at the same time by the House.

Mr. BLACK replied, that if the report was ready, the printing would not be ready. He would, however, say that the branch of the subject to which the gentleman referred, had not been definitely acted on by the committee. The committee, it was true, had decided against the proposition, and had directed him to make a report to that effect, but he had not yet had time to do it, unless he laid aside all other business to attend to this.

Mr. GARLAND said that it was desirable that the House should have both the subjects referred to the committee, before it at the same time, and he thought the chairman might, without much inconvenience, enable the House to do so. The committee, on Wednesday last, decided against the proposition as unconstitutional and highly inexpedient, and directed the committee to make a report to that effect. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman would be ready with his report by Wednesday next. He had prepared the minority report, and would be ready to present it any time.

Mr. BLACK did not think it necessary that the two subjects should be considered by the House at the same time. Nay, he thought it more expedient that they should be considered separately. Indeed, it was impracticable to consider both subjects together, because the gentleman and his friends had agreed to recommend to the House that no change with regard to the manner and form of executing the public printing be made this session; it being the prices only that was proposed to be regulated. Such being the case, why urge the consideration of that branch of the subject relating to the separation of the public printing from the political press, when it had no direct connection with the other branch, relative to the change of the prices of the printing, and which ought immediately to be acted on?

Mr. DAVIS observed that the gentleman from Louisiana had informed the House that he was ready, on the part of the minority of the committee, to report on the subject he was so solicitous about, and therefore, if the House was disposed to discuss it, it could be discussed as well on the report of the minority as on that of the majority.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked what was the question before the House, and

The SPEAKER replied that it was the proposition to postpone the further consideration of the report of the Select Committee on Printing till Wednesday next.

Mr. RUSSELL remarked that it was very evident that this business was not in a state to be acted on now, and that the report not having been prepared, it was not probable that it would be ready for the action of the House so soon as Wednesday next. For the purpose, therefore, of giving the chairman of the committee time to prepare his report, as well as for the House to have it printed, he would suggest whether it was not more advisable to postpone the subject to a day more distant than that named. He would name Tuesday week, which would give the gentleman from Georgia ample time to prepare his intended report.

Mr. R. GARLAND opposed the proposition of Mr. RUSSELL, and assigned his reasons for so doing.

Mr. RUSSELL understood that the committee had agreed upon a reduction of the prices of the public printing, and had reported on that branch of the subject; but that was not the only matter referred to them. They had also been instructed to inquire and report upon the expediency of separating the public printing from the political press. Now, although the majority of the committee had decided against that proposition, and had instructed their chairman to report accordingly to the House, he had not yet had time to do it. But Mr. R. thought that the latter was the more important subject of the two, and that it ought to be brought before the House at the same time with the other, in order that it might be the better enabled to judge how far the reduction should be carried. For the purpose of giving ample time to the chairman to prepare this second report, he had named Tuesday week for the postponement, and if the gentleman from Louisiana would consider what the House had to do in the mean time, he would perceive that they could not well take up the subject at an earlier day. The bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures had been made the special order for Tuesday next, and the consideration of this bill would consume two or three days at least. Then the gentleman, he was sure, would not interfere with the Fridays and Saturdays set apart for private bills, while the Monday following was petition day. So that the subjebt of printing, as he had before observed, could not well be taken up before Tuesday week.

Mr. GRAVES, after some remarks, offered a resolution that the Select Committee on Printing be required to report on the remaining branch of the subject referred to them in the course of the present week.

Mr. BLACK observed that he would have no objection to that resolution, were it not a direct reflection upon the committee. The committee had, under the instructions of the House, examined a vast mass of testimony, and had found the duties imposed on them so arduous, that the House had, from time to time, extended the period to which their report was to be made. They had already reported on one branch of the subject committed to them, the one that they deemed the most urgent, but had not yet been able to report on the other. Had they known that the gentleman from Louisiana was so exceedingly anxious for a report on the other, they might perhaps have given it the preference, as their decision was made up on it. The committee had agreed that it was inexpedient for the House to adopt this last proposition, and they thought that it would be inconvenient to consider it in connection with the subject reported on.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject till Thursday next.

The question being first on the most remote period, i. e. on Mr. RUSSELL's motion for Tuesday week, on count there were ayes 64, nays 43; and no quorum having voted,

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for tellers, and Messrs. VANDERPOEL and REYNOLDS having been appointed such, ascertained, on count, that there were ayes 65, nays 62. So the subject was postponed till, and made the special order of the day, for Tuesday week next.

The SPEAKER said that the business first in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman, to have the report of that committee and all the testimony in relation to the New Jersey contested election printed, and the amendment of Mr. R. GARLAND thereto to discharge the committee from the further consideration of other testimony.

Mr. FILLMORE, who was entitled to the floor, at the request of Mr. CAMPBELL, gave way for an explanation.

Mr. CAMPBELL said that he had been inattentive to the progress of the debate, and when he rose on yesterday to answer a question addressed to him, it was under a misapprehension of what the question was. Before he had taken his seat, however, he understood from the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] that the question related to the reading of testimony after the committee had assembled to take into consideration the resolution of the House, under which the report was made. To the question thus limited as to time, he answered, that during the pendency of a motion in committee, instructing the chairman to draw up a report, a member had called for the reading of the testimony, and that all the papers called for were read. Mr. C had since understood that the inquiry was still further limited as to what papers were actually read upon this occasion. In answer to this question, he would state that, according to his recollection, the returns of the local officers of the townships of Millville and South Amboy were called for in succession; that they were read by the Clerk; that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] then called for other testimony; it was produced, but before it was read, the call was withdrawn.

Mr. C. made this statement not because he considered it of any importance to the present controversy, but as a specific answer to a specific question. All that is contended for in relation to the reading of testimony, after the committee assembled to take into consideration the instructions under which they reported, is, that a member had called for the reading of the testimony; that the Chair had decided it to be the privilege of a member, before voting, to do so; and that all the papers required to be read were read—thus showing, conclusively, not only that the testimony was accessible to all, but that any member of the committee, not satisfied with the examination it had received, had the right, even at this late stage of our proceedings, to have it read in committee.

Mr. FILLMORE. When was it that the returns from Millville and South Amboy were read—was it when the committee agreed on the basis of a report, or when they met to consider the report?

Mr. CAMPBELL had already stated that they were read pending the motion requesting the chairman to draw up a report.

Mr. FILLMORE then went on, and replied to some remarks of Mr. CAMPBELL made yesterday, and which have not yet been reported; after which, he replied to the remarks of Mr. MERRILL, and continued speaking till the expiration of the morning hour; when, without having concluded,

Mr. ALFORD moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day; which motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the President of the United States, enclosing a report from the Secretary of War, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, and that of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, in respect to the military preparations of the British authorities on the Northern frontiers of the United States, from Lake Superior to the Atlantic ocean, distinguishing the permanent from the temporary and field work, and particularly noting those which are within the claimed limits of the United States.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill reported by Mr. BELL, to secure the freedom of elections, and to prevent the interference of the Federal officers in elections. The question being, Shall the bill be read the first time?

Mr. WATTERSON being entitled to the floor on the above question, replied at some length to his colleague from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] That gentleman had complained of the summary manner in which his motion for leave to report the bill had been treated by a portion of the friends of the Administration. He presumed the gentlemen who opposed the leave, did it from a conviction that the principles of the bill were so abominable, so odious, that it was best to stifle it on the threshold, and thereby save the consumption of the time of the House, which might be appropriated to the transaction of the business of the country. Though he had voted for the leave, he entertained as great a repugnance to the features of the bill as any of those who had opposed it. He had voted for it because he wished to see a vote taken upon it, and let the country see who were in favor of its odious features. He thought that if the bill contained the principles of the Whig party, it was proper that the people should know it. But he believed that when the House should be called to vote upon it, such dodging would be witnessed as had never been done since the vote on the rejection of the bill in the Senate, reported by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] His colleague had complained that the minority of the House had been gagged by the majority. He asked if it was to be found in his seven hours' speech, and the elaborate speeches and unprofitable debates which the party the gentleman belongs to had indulged in. The facts of the stave-off principles of the Opposition are notorious; yet forsooth they were gagged. If it was not the disposition of a majority to sit out the important questions before the House, none of the business of the country would be transacted. The Whig party oppose every thing and bring forward nothing. In reply to his colleague, he said that the cry of office holders was not new to his ears. He had often heard the same sound. Strangers to the cry would suppose that all the office holders were enemies to their country, and particularly if they were to hear with what emphasis his colleague dwelt upon the name. If there were too many office holders, let his colleague specify them and bring forward a measure to dispense with them, and he would go for it. No proposition had yet come from him for that purpose—and none could be expected. It was notorious that a majority of all the office holders were opposed to the Administration—still the Opposition cry out proscription. Mr. W. said there were at least 12,000 postmasters, and a majority of them were opposed to the Administration.

Mr. REED inquired what was the amount of their salaries.

Mr. WATTERSON said their salaries were small, he knew; but in point of influence, at a cross road, they had more than any member of the cabinet. Postmasters had a tremendous influence, if they wished to exercise it by distributing documents and procuring subscribers for newspapers. This kind of influence had been probably exercised for the Opposition party. If the President was to be censured at all, it ought to be for keeping in office so many of his opponents. If he was to have all the odium, he thought he ought to have it for something. From the continual clamor about proscription, a person who knew nothing about it might well suppose that there was some truth in it; but the charge could not be sustained by the facts of the case. The President does not agree to pursue such a course as he would urge. So far as he (Mr. W.) was concerned, he would, as to all important officers, sweep the political chessboard; and he believed it was all sheer hypocrisy in the Opposition, when they make any other profession, because, whenever and wherever they have the power, they carry out the principles of indiscriminate proscription.

Mr. W. said he would like to see the political friends of his colleague [Mr. BELL] from the State of New York, vote for the bill. During the Legislature now in session, the Whig Governor of that State turned out six hundred office holders, including those of the lowest grade.

Mr. MARVIN begged leave to interrupt and correct his friend. He was mistaken, the Governor did not turn out a single one.

Mr. W. resumed. He has refused to reappoint, which is the same thing. Was it not notorious that the Whig city Council of New York turned out every man, even the street scavengers? See in the State of Pennsylvania. Did the Ritner dynasty carry out the spoils principle, as my colleague has been pleased to call it? He made a clean sweep. The white laborers on the public works even were dismissed, and as he had just been informed, negroes were put in their places. In New Jersey, the great broad seal State, every justice of the peace was dismissed; and in Connecticut, and every other State where they had the power, the same course had been pursued. If the country should be cursed by the election of the nominee of the Harrisburg convention, they will change their clamor; but there was no danger that they would ever have that cause for ceasing their hypocritical cry of proscription. Notwithstanding (said Mr. W.) I am for a clean sweep, I would censure the President, or any other man for turning out competent, meritorious, and respectable officers, and appoint others just the the reverse. But if he could find among his own friends those who were equally competent and deserving, he would invariably give them the preference.

We have heard much from my colleague, and others, about the influence of office holders in favor of the Administration. Where, let me ask, is the evidence of that influence. Is it to be found in Washington city, where there are so many, and where nine-tenths of the people are opposed to this Democratic Administration? The Administration have been defeated in New York, Boston, New Orleans, where there are so many of the officers of the General Government, in the custom-houses, mints, &c. Look at the city of Philadelphia, in which are to be found a custom-house, mint, &c. In that city, the Democratic party have been defeated by 4,000. Did this look like the office holders had much influence? Judging from the facts before them, the influence was on the side of the Opposition.

His colleague had denominated the Democratic party as the vampire party, and said it could not stand a day, if his bill, and the bill introduced in the other end of the Capitol, of like import, had passed: that they would have the same effect on the Democratic party as did the surgeon's knife in despatching the vampire—a history of the existence and destruction of which he had cited. What had been the consequence of the use of this surgeon's knife—the gag bill—in the Senate? It had bled to death two of his colleague's political friends, the late Senators from Tennessee.

My colleague also said his bill was to prevent the interference of federal officers in elections—in other words, it was to gag them—it was, in its effect, to deprive them of their rights under the Constitution—to think, to speak, and to act; it was to enslave them; and yet he says it was to emancipate them. He could not reconcile these two declarations, and was at a loss to know how his colleague could. He asked if the bill was not the same in principle, if not in detail, as that introduced into the Senate last session by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] If he was not mistaken, his colleague had approved of that bill, and that the features were the same as the bill now introduced by him. Mr. W. said he had read the speech of his colleague on the Harbor bill in 1836, in which he quoted an old English statute, which was almost word for word with Mr. CRITTENDEN's bill, and held it up as worthy of imitation by this free country. He therefore inferred that his colleague was in favor of that gag bill.

Mr. W. then adverted to the standing charge of the Opposition in relation to defaulters. He read from an official document, printed by order of the House, giving a list of the defaulters, and the amount of defalcations, since the formation of the Government to the 4th March, 1837, by which he showed that there was more money lost under the four years' Administration of John Quincy Adams than was lost under the eight years comprising General Jackson's Administration, in proportion to the amount collected and disbursed. Yet the Opposition were exerting every nerve to restore that Administration to power—for he contended that, notwithstanding it was not proposed to advance the same man, it was to restore the same odious Federal principles.

Mr. W. said, as his colleague had talked about office holders, it would be no harm to talk about office seekers, of whom there were twice the number. He held in his hand a document containing the names of those who composed the Harrisburg Convention, nominating General Harrison for the Presidency. In looking over that pamphlet, the question occurred to Mr. W. Who were these delegates? What are their principles? What are their professions? Were they delegates fresh from the people, or were they the representatives of mere town politicians, and street brawlers? He had collected a mass of information on these points, and intended to lay it before the House and the country. It was not his purpose to misrepresent delegates to that Convention, but to show that their avocations did not conform to the characters of those who live in log cabins, and drink hard cider. The president of the Convention (said Mr. W.) was Judge Barbour, a lawyer, Mr. Adams's Secretary of State and Minister to the Court of St. James.

Mr. LINCOLN rose, and called the gentleman to order. He was not in the habit of interrupting the course of the discussions going on, but the course of debate of the gentleman from Tennessee was such, that he felt it his duty to endeavor to put a stop to it. The gentleman was giving biographical sketches, and commenting on the political conduct of individuals over the whole Union. Such a course of debate was entirely out of order; and he called upon the SPEAKER now to decide whether the rules of the House were to be enforced or not.

Mr. WATTERSTON said that his colleague [Mr. BELL] had yesterday entertained the House with a discussion on the influences exercised by office holders in the political affairs of the country, and he thought it but right, as an offset to that course of argument, to show the influence attempted and exercised by those seeking office. He wanted to show the characters of the motley assemblage of those seeking to break down the present Administration, and the discordant materials of which their party was composed.

Mr. STARKWEATHER said it appeared to him that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WATTERSON] might be permitted to speak of men and things in this country, when the colleague of the gentleman [Mr. BELL] was yesterday permitted to tell a long story about a loafer out of the country [in France] who went about sucking people's blood.

Mr. GENTRY hoped that his colleague might be permitted to proceed.

Mr. MASON strongly objected to the course of debate indulged in by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WATTERSON,] and expressed the hope that the SPEAKER would enforce the rules of the House. Mr. M. said that he intended, on this question, to call for a division of the House, in order that it might be definitively settled whether discussions of this character should be permitted. Mr. M. was proceeding with his remarks, when

Mr. WISE called him to order. His friend from Ohio, he said, while lecturing the gentleman from Tennessee on a point of order, was himself out of order.

Mr. BRIGGS objected to the gentleman's proceeding out of order. If, said he, the SPEAKER decides that he is out of order, I object to his going on without permission of the House, and will call for the yeas and nays on the question.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee were certainly not in order. Gentlemen had been in the habit of indulging in great latitude of debate, and this being the custom of the House, was permitted by the CHAIR; but the gentleman from Tennessee had commented on the political conduct and characters of individuals, which was not customary.

Mr. WELLER contended that the gentleman from Tennessee had not departed from the usual course of discussion that had been practised in the House, and he therefore moved that he be permitted to proceed in the same course; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. WATTERSON regretted very much that he had been interrupted, because he could have concluded his remarks in the time occupied by the interruption. He said his colleague [Mr. BELL] had been denouncing the officers of the Government as vampires, sucking blood out of the country. And was it irrelevant to the subject before the House for him (Mr. WATTERSON) to speak of those who wanted to come into power? He was only endeavoring, at the commencement of his remarks, to get at the principles of the convention that nominated General Harrison for the Presidency.

Here Mr. W. commented on the correspondence between an association at Oswego, New York, and General Harrison's conscience keepers, and was proceeding to analyze the politics of the members of the Harrisburg Convention, when

Mr. LINCOLN again interrupted Mr. W. and said he thought this was a fit occasion to have the rules of the House distinctly understood and enforced. If the CHAIR decided that the gentleman was out of order, he insisted that he take his seat, until the House gave him permission to proceed in order. He assured the gentleman from Tennessee that he meant no unkindness or disrespect to him personally; but his desire to see the rules of the House preserved was the occasion of his interfering in this matter. He hoped the gentleman, if permitted to proceed, would proceed in order.

Mr. BROWN begged leave to remind the House of one fact. His colleague [Mr. BELL,] on yesterday spoke of the influence of office holders, and the President at the head of them, and described also a Central Committee, with their action, all over the country. Now he understood that his other colleague [Mr. WATTERSON,] desired to show that there was a sort of central committee for the Opposition, pursuing the same line of conduct, and to draw a comparison between them. It appeared to him that if this was a legitimate course of argument for the one, it certainly ought to be so for the other.

Mr. CLIFFORD was glad that this question had been made, and should vote to sustain the decision of the CHAIR. He was glad also that the SPEAKER manifested a disposition to preserve the rules of the House. Though the motion on this question might operate with peculiar hardship against his friend from Tennessee, yet he should vote for it, though at the same time he would express his regret that the gentleman in the Opposition had not shown the same fastidious regard for the preservation to the rules on former occasions, when their friends were consuming the time of the House with discussions foreign to the subject under consideration. He hoped his friends would openly meet this question and settle it, and that hereafter gentlemen in the Opposition would be as ready to enforce the rules as now.

Mr. WISE objected to the discussion, as out of order. He had no objection to the gentleman's proceeding in his own way, and hoped he might be permitted to go on.

Mr. BELL wished to make one remark. An impression seemed to prevail that his colleague would be prevented from answering a speech of his which was supposed by some to be out of order, or that some parts of it were out of order. Under these circumstances, he should be very sorry to deprive his colleague of the opportunity of replying in his own way. Whether his remarks were out of order or not, the apprehensions of the other party should operate on his friends to induce them to permit his colleague to proceed. He would, however, say that he did not recollect a single observation in his speech that was not strictly in accordance with parliamentary law. He confined himself entirely to the discussion of the subject before the House, digressing only where an applicable illustration of it presented itself.

Mr. CHAPMAN said that he was extremely glad that the crisis had at last arrived that he had desired to see ever since he had been a member of this House. He had seen, with extreme regret, the latitude of debate—the palpable digression from the legitimate subject under discussion by members of this body—and he had earnestly desired to see this most injurious course put down by a vote of the House.

Mr. C. said that he never indulged in such latitude in debate; indeed he had been as seldom indulged in debate here as any member on the floor, and had consumed as little of the time of the House in that way.

A few days ago, Mr. C. said, when in Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] was called to order for digressing from the subject under debate, by a political opponent, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] the CHAIR deciding that although the speaker was digressing, yet, as it had been the practice here, he could not determine him to be out of order. I thought then that a proper case had occurred to put an end to the practice as far as my voice could do it; and in a case, too, when my motives could not be suspected to be improper—objection having been taken to a political friend by a political opponent. I therefore took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR; but the CHAIR decided the appeal to be too late, and the question was not put. And here, Mr. C. said, a gentleman [Mr. GRAVES] had made an improper insinuation as to the motive that had influenced his course, although he was conscious that his motives were influenced alone from a sense of public duty, and a sincere regard to the interest of the country.

Mr C. said that speeches had become so common, so lengthy, and so foreign from the subjects under debate generally, that the most important public and legitimate business of the country was not only delayed, but omitted altogether. This evil he thought greater, much greater, than any reasonable restriction in debate to the subject under discussion.

Mr. C. said he was aware that his constituents complained that he did not participate more in the debates in this House; but he was very sure that if their constituents could witness the scenes we have here, the waste of public time and money by useless and ineffectual debate, they would never complain on that account.

Mr. C. remarked that he was convinced that his friend from Tennessee, [Mr. WATTERSON,] who was now called to order, was not more out of order than his colleague [Mr. BELL] was yesterday, but on the contrary, was in a legitimate course of argument in reply to his colleague. But, Mr. C. said, that both had digressed from the subject, and he was still better satisfied that, in sustaining the opinion of the SPEAKER, when against a personal and political friend, as he should do now, his motives could not be impugned by his friend from Tennessee, who had been called to order, or any one else. Mr. C. said he thanked the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] who is his political opponent, for raising the question now on the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WATTERSON,] his personal and political friend. He (Mr. C.) would unite with the gentleman from Massachusetts in putting an end to this unwarrantable practice, so injurious to the good order of this House, and the accomplishment of the business of the country, of which so little has, even at this day, been done. But, said Mr. C. that gentleman and his friends must take notice that the same strict rule shall be applied to them hereafter.

Mr. WISE could not vote for this question of order till he knew what was the offence of the gentleman from Tennessee against order. Was the gentleman called to order for the irrelevancy of his argument?

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman was called to order for discussing the politics of the individuals assembled at the Harrisburg convention, and the CHAIR decided that such discussion was out of order. The remarks of the SPEAKER explaining his decision were not heard distinctly enough to report.

Mr. WISE believed that the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee was true, that had he not been interrupted, he would have finished his speech by this time. If I had been in the chair, said Mr. W. I would never interrupt a gentleman for what your illustrious predecessor called irrelevancy of argument. The gentleman from Tennessee did allude to the political characters of certain distinguished individuals as an offset to the argument of his colleague; and though this might be deemed irrelevant to the matter under consideration, yet he did not think he ought to be interrupted for it. He never would attempt to chain down the mind of man for what was called irrelevancy in debate He would continue to object to such interruptions, and go for what is called latitude of debate, for latitude of debate was the life of the Opposition.

Mr. LINCOLN stated what Mr. WATTERSON'S course of argument had been, and his objections to it.

Mr. WISE said he understood all that. He heard from the CHAIR what was the course of the gentleman's argument, and his decision upon the point of order raised. What did it amount to? When a gentleman on one side had been showing the actings and doings of those in office and in power, the appropriate answer was to show the actings and doings of those seeking office and power. He thought that the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, even in the extreme light the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] had put it, was a fair and pertinent response to his colleague.

Mr. MASON here called Mr. WISE to order, and said that the gentleman from Virginia was discussing the very question he pronounced him out of order for discussing.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman from Ohio is wrong. When he was discussing the subject he was out of order, for no appeal was then taken from the decision of the CHAIR; but now there was an appeal pending, and it was perfectly in order for him (Mr. WISE) to discuss it. I am, said Mr. W. for the gentleman going on as he has begun. If he can stand the examination of the motives and characters of those in power, we surely can stand the examination of the motives and characters of those seeking to turn them out. The subject under discussion, was a bill to secure the freedom of elections; and the merits of the whole question required a wide and ample discussion of all the collateral subjects involved in it. He contended that no gentlemen should be called to order except for actual personal disorder. If this unhappily occurred, the Sergeant-at-Arms should be sent to him; but he never would agree to a decision that shuts a speaker's mouth on the mere point of irrelevancy. Let me tell my friends in the Opposition that, if they sustain this appeal, their hands will be in the lion's mouth. You, sir, [the SPEAKER,] may be logician enough to decide promptly what is, or is not, relevant in debate; but we know the facility with which appeals are taken and sustained here. Let me tell gentlemen that, if they ever attempt to apply the screws to me for this irrelevancy in debate, I will throw them into a scene of disorder which it will not be so easy to get out of. This would be easy for a man of nerve to do when he was determined to maintain his rights.

If God spares me health and strength, I shall want, myself, full and free scope at those in power and place, before this session closes, and all I desire is an open field and a fair fight.

Mr. CUSHING observed that this was a proper time to settle the question whether the remainder of the session shall be consumed in idle debate, or whether the rules shall be enforced, and the business of the country progressed with. Was the appeal debatable?

The SPEAKER said it was not.

Mr WISE said if he had been aware that it was not debatable, he would not have made the remarks he did.

Mr. BROWN of Mississippi here withdrew his appeal.

Mr. CRABB moved that the gentlemen from Tennessee be permitted to proceed; which motion being agreed to,

Mr. WATTERSON then resumed his remarks, and had proceeded but a short time, when he was again called to order by

Mr. CUSHING, who said that he had heard gentlemen all around him saying "let him go on," but really he thought the point should be made and decided whether the remainder of this session is to be consumed in unprofitable debate or not.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman was not strictly in order, but he had been permitted by the House to go on.

Mr. DAWSON hoped the country would be given to understand that the character of their proceedings was not owing to the SPEAKER but to the House itself—for whenever he attempted to enforce the rules of the House, the House had uniformly interposed and suffered the disorderly debate to go on.

Mr. DUNCAN observed that it was a little unfortunate that the gentlemen who were so solicitous about the preservation of the rules, should have been silent when the debate on the Cumberland road was going on. On that occasson, they indulged themselves in the greatest latitude of discussion, and made speeches of two hours' length, in which the Cumberland road was little thought of, but an abundance was said in favor of the claims of General Harrison to the Presidency. Now, when a Democrat gets up to reply, which he has the right to do, and which his duty to his constituents requires, he cannot say a word in relation to General Harrison and his supporters, without being called to order.

Mr. LINCOLN said the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] did not apply to him; for when the Cumberland road was under consideration, he interposed his objections to the course the debate had taken.

Mr. DUNCAN said his remarks did not apply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, but to others of the party he acted with.

Mr. LINCOLN, after a few remarks, said it was now time to decide the question for the rest of the session, whether the rules shall be enforced or not, and whether these irrelevant debates shall be indulged in any longer. He objected to the gentleman's proceeding until a motion was made that he proceed in order, and on that motion he intended to call for the yeas and nays.

After some further remarks from Messrs. DAWSON, BANKS, LINCOLN, DDOMGOOLE, STUART, CUSHING,

On motion of Mr. BANKS of Virginia,

Mr. WATTERSON was permitted to proceed, but had not given the professions and politics of more than two or three delegates in the Harrisburg Convention, when he was called to order by Mr. SALTONSTALL, who said that he would like to know what the Hartford Convention had to do with the subject before the House.

Mr. WISE must in justice say, after making a speech in favor of the gentleman from Tennessee, that his imagination could not see the relevancy of his remarks.

Mr. WATTERSON. I have said nothing about the Hartford Convention. The gentleman seems to be extremely sensitive on that subject, and furnishes a striking illustration of the fact that the "wicked fleeth, when no man pursueth." I am very sorry to be called to order so often. If members of the Opposition on this floor would strictly confine themselves to order, I would strictly confine myself to order. If gentlemen will not permit me to lay before the House the complexion of the delegates to the Harrisburg Convention, they cannot deprive me of the privilege of doing so when I write out my remarks. But as I have sat here from day to day, and listened to Whig members making party speeches, which had no relevancy, not the most remote, to the subject before the House, I little expected, I confess, to hear myself called to order so repeatedly from that quarter.

[Cries of "go on, go on," from many—let's have all their names.]

Mr. WATTERSON said, no. Leave had been given him to proceed several times, and before he could define the position of more than a single delegate in that Convention, he was again called to order; and he was now determined to go on with his comments, which would be in order. He said the information which he had been prevented from laying before the House, would show whose candidate General Harrison was. After commenting at length on the Harrisburg Convention, he passed on to the late Ohio Convention.

Mr. W. then read from a newspaper in his hand a list of the members of that convention, giving their politics and occupations.

Mr. MASON asked the gentleman what paper he was reading from?

Mr. WATTERSON answered that it was the Ohio Statesman.

Mr. MASON said the statement was wholly untrue in many particulars, to his knowledge. The designation of the individuals in his county was altogether incorrect; and he had been assured by some of his colleagues that it was equally untrue with regard to the counties in which they resided. Indeed, the whole statement had been publicly contradicted in a paper in his State, [naming it,] and the editor who made it called on to produce the proof, which he failed to do.

Mr. BOND corroborated the statement of his colleague, [Mr. MASON,] and said that the statement, so far as it regarded the individuals living in his county, was wholly destitute of truth. The account had been publicly contradicted, and the editor called on for his proof, which he was unable to produce. The Editor of the Ohio Statesmen was notorious in his State for his want of veracity, and was entitled to no credit. His paper was so remarkable in that particular, that in one instance one hundred and sixty falsehoods had been counted in it.

Mr. WATTERSON said he did not pretend to be personaliy acquainted with the individuals named in the paper before him. The paper occupied a respectable standing in the State of Ohio, and he had no reason to doubt its statements. He would like, however, to hear from his Democratic friend from Ohio on the subject.

Mr. MEDILL said that he was accidentally absent during the discussion that had just taken place, and had only resumed his seat in time to hear a part of the remarks of his honorable colleague, [Mr. BOND.] Had his colleague confined his remarks to a mere denial of the correctness of the statement contained in the paper alluded to, he did not know that he would feel called on to make any reply. He was acquainted with but few of the persons named as having been appointed to attend the convention, and had no other information on the subject than he derived through the various papers of the day. He was entirely willing to rest the correctness of the statement with the people of Ohio, on the assertion of the paper in which it is contained, and the denial of his colleague. The names of the delegates that attended the convention from the county in which he, Mr. M. resided, are not given, except to a very limited extent. The official character of the very few that are reported, is correctly designated. Six of them hold appointments under the Federal Government. They are highly respectable, but so far from residing in "log cabins" and depending for a precarious subsistence on "hard cider," he believed the whole six were merchants, of considerable capital, and who indulged pretty largely in the good things for which that county was so distinguished.

But his colleague did not stop here. He had seen proper to avail himself of his privileges on this floor, and the advantages thereby obtained, to satiate his political hatred, by an attack on the private reputation of the editor. He would be wanting in respect to himself, as a citizen of Ohio, and to a large majority of those whom he represented here, if he permitted that gentleman to be thus unjustly assailed in his absence, without exposing the motive that prompted so great a departure from the ordinary rules of decorum. As a man of honor and integrity—a citizen whose social intercourse is sought, and almost universally esteemed, he did not know that the Editor of the Statesman would lose any thing by a comparison with any of the delegation on that floor. He had known him long and intimately. He had seen him elected to the House of Representatives by as honest, as respectable, and as truth-loving a constituency, as his honorable colleague himself could boast of. He had seen him transferred from thence to a seat in the Senate by the same constituency, and finally elected by a joint vote of both branches of the Legislature to the responsible office of Printer to the State. Still rising in the estimation and confidence of the public, he was re-elected during the last winter to the same high, responsible office, by a vote of more than two to one in the Legislature of his State. Such, sir, is the character and standing of the individual on whom my honorable colleague would seek to wreak his political enmity to the principles of the Administration.

Mr. BOND said that if his colleague was willing to compare himself with the Editor of the Ohio Statesman, he was at perfect liberty to do so; but that he (Mr. B.) would not agree to be put on a level with him. When his colleague said that he never heard the characters of the Editors of that paper impeached, he confessed he never was more astonished in his life. He had heard one of them published by the name of "lying Jake."

Mr. MEDILL would inquire whom his colleague alluded to.

Mr. BOND said he alluded to Jacob Medary.

Mr. MEDILL said that Jacob Medary was in no way interested in the Statesman or any other paper, either as Editor or publisher.

Mr BOND. Then if he is not the Editor of the Statesman, he is brother of the Editor. He was once interested, and he did not know that he had ceased to be so.

Mr. MEDILL said, that when his colleague dragged into his debates on this floor the names of private individuals residing in his own State, and who were no way connected with the subject under consideration, he should be certain he was correct. As to epithets or cognomens of this kind, we know they are in the gift of all, and are sometives conferred on the most worthy and deserving. His honorable colleague was himself occasionally honored, in some places, with a nearly similar appellation, after the publication of his celebrated speech a year or two since. No one stands higher in the social community in which he resides than the young gentleman alluded to. As to my colleague's unwillingness to be compared to the Editor of the Statesman, perhaps it arises from his apprehensions of the result. If popular confidence at home is the criterion of respectability here, (and I do not know on what else my colleague particularly relies,) then is the Editor his superior.

Mr. WELLER observed, that with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WATTERSON,] he would like to say a word to his honorable colleague over the way, [Mr. BOND.] The statement made by the Ohio Statesman in relation to the materials which composed the late Whig Convention, had been impeached by his colleague. All he desired to say on this subject was, that so far as that list gave the business and occupations of the delegates appointed from the district which he had the honor to represent, he believed it was strictly correct. He was personally acquainted with nearly all of the individuals named, and therefore had no hesitancy in making this statement. He would not undertake to say whether it was proper, or even decent, for his colleague to drag before this House a private citizen of Ohio, and apply to him the epithet of "Lying Jake." Sir, said Mr. W. if that be decency, I should dislike very much to be called a decent man.

[Here the SPEAKER called Mr. W. to order.]

Mr. BOND said that, if his colleague had any thing to say to him personally, here or elsewhere, he was willing to hear it.

Mr. WELLER. All I have to say to the gentleman, I have already said; and I hope he understands me. One other remark, (said Mr. W.) and I have done. My colleague has stated that one of the Editors of the Statesman is known in Ohio by the appellation of "lying Jake." Now, sir, the veracity of my honorable colleague will be seen when I state the fact, that the individual to whom he alludes is not one of the Editors of that paper, nor is he connected in any way with the publication of that paper. He is (said Mr. W.) as honorable and respectable a man as there is in the State, and will compare with my honorable colleague in truth and veracity, and every thing else that characterizes the gentleman.

Mr. ANDREWS hoped the gentlemen from Ohio would go into one of the committee rooms and settle their State affairs, and that the order of the proceedings be enforced.

Mr. BOND said he again pronounced the statement false. So far as regarded the county in which he lived, he knew that it was not true. Mr. B. again repeated that this paper was so notorious for its falsehoods, that in one instance one hundred and sixty lies had been detected in it.

Mr. WELLER. Does my colleague mean to say that the statement is false with regard to the persons in the district where I live? If so, I have a word to say to him.

Mr. BOND. I do not speak of the district in which the gentleman lives; but I speak of the county of Muskingum and the county in which I live, and know it is false as regards the individuals belonging to those countries.

Mr. WATTERSON then continued his remarks without further interruption. When he concluded, the House,

On motion of Mr. GENTRY,

Adjourned,

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, as early as practicable, the whole of the proceedings of a court martial recently assembled at Charlestown, Massachusetts, for the trial of 2d Lieutenant Louis F. Whitney, of the Marine Corps; the charges and specifications against him; as well as all correspondence had in relation thereto, between the Secretary of the Navy, or any one else by his directions, and all other persons whomsoever: also, that he be requested to communicate whether a certain letter, signed "G. W. Davis," containing allegations against Lieut. Whitney, received by the Secretary of the Navy in December last, did not on the trial prove to be fictitious; as well, also, whether any steps have been taken for the purpose of discovering the writer or author of the said letter.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. TALLMADGE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Agreeably to previous notice, Mr. SEVIER asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of George Duval and others; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation in the State of Alabama, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therin can be completed, and for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, was taken up.

The third section of the bill to abolish the office of Solicitor was stricken out of the bill.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama had then offered an amendment to abolish the office of Recorder of the General Land Office. The amendment was advocated by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, and opposed by Messrs. KING, PRESTON, TAPPAN, and CLAYTON, and rejected—ayes 18, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Merrick, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Strange, Tappan, and White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, Wright, and Young—25.

The bill was then, after being amended on motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was then taken up, the question being on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. SOUTHARD addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill. While he believed fully that Congress had the constitutional power to appropriate money for works of internal improvement, he was opposed to borrowing money for that purpose. The Administration had not recommended this appropriation, the Secretary of the Treasury had not included it in his annual estimates, and he, for one, was not willing to subject himself, and the party with which he acted, to the charge of extravagant appropriations, after the lecture they had received from the Executive on the subject of economy. He adverted to the annual message of the President, and particularly that portion of it recommending economy in the public expenditures, and denounced it as the most impudent and the most insulting lecture that has ever been given to any Congress by any man who has ever honored or dishonored the Executive chair.

Mr. S. was followed by

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, who said he had always believed that the Constitution conferred the power on Congress to make appropriations for the construction of works of internal improvement. But while he believed this, he could not support the present bill, when it would be necessary to create a national debt to procure funds for carrying on the road. He alluded to the veto on the Maysville road bill, and said that, since that period, the three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, have had a monopoly of the favors of the Government in the way of appropriations for internal improvement, to the exclusion of all the other States of the Union. He said that these three States had supported the Administration, and the Executive who vetoed the Maysville turnpike road, which was a link in the great southwestern arm of the National road, and now support an Administration pledged to the same principles; and a majority of the delegates from those States have always voted against the bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the several States, which would enable all to participate in the benefits which were now enjoyed by these three States exclusively. He referred to the great expense of the road, which in Indiana cost at the rate of $14,000 per mile, while in Kentucky the State had constructed upwards of six hundred miles of Macadamized road at a rate of about $6000 per mile. He attributed this to a shameful waste of the public money, or that those who had the management of the road considered themselves as entitled to a share of the public spoils, and had governed themselves accordingly. Considering the embarrassed state of the Treasury, and considering the propriety of the members of the Opposition avoiding even the appearance of countenancing extravagant appropriations, he thought the best course would be to remit the whole subject to President Harrison, who would take possession of the White House on the 5th of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-one.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana followed in reply to Messrs. SOUTHARD and CLAY of Kentucky. He examined the several positions assumed by those gentlemen, and argued to show their unsoundness. They had pretended to oppose its present prosecution on the ground that the country was in debt; while the journals would show that those gentlemen had voted for much larger appropriations for this road, when the national debt was ten times greater than at present. They oppose it now when we have a debt of five millions of Treasury notes, and yet they voted for larger appropriations for the road when we had a national debt of fifty millions of dollars. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had stated that as he had voted against the Treasury Note bill, he felt it would not be right in him to vote for a bill which would draw so much money from the Treasury. But the Senator is well aware that the bill was passed: that the Treasury has been supplied with means, which, if not expended on this road, will be expended on other objects in which the people of the West have no interest. But the Senators from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] and New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] have given us another reason for voting against this bill—that it has not been recommended by the Administration. This is a strange argument, coming from that quarter. When did they begin to take the recommendations of the Administration as the guide for their conduct? He felt that he was as much disposed as either of those gentlemen to take the Administration for his guide, but he would not permit the recommendation of this Administration, or of any other, to influence him to give a vote which his judgment and conscience told him was wrong. The President had recommended the Sub-Treasury bill. Had either of those gentlemen been influenced by his recommendation? Did they vote for it? I come here, said Mr. S. to represent a sovereign and independent State, and not to represent this Administration; and what I feel that duty to my State and to my country commands me to do, that I will do, utterly regardless whether the Administration points to the right or to the left. While every other appropriation of the Government is supported, this alone is singled out as an object of attack. While millions upon millions are expended on your seaboard, this small appropriation for the favorite measure of the West is to be denied. He had expected that if this great measure was to receive the fatal blow, it would go down by the hands of its enemies, and not by the hands of its professed friends.

Mr. YOUNG followed at length in reply to Messrs. CLAY and SOUTHARD. He said the fiat had gone forth, and the bill must fall; but he said the road would not be relinquished, and the States interested in it would soon be enabled to present it under more potent auspices, if not here, at least in another wing of the Capitol, when he trusted they would be able to make their rights felt and respected. He had thought that when the appropriations in this bill had been cut down to one-half their original amount, it would have been permitted to pass. He scouted the idea that because this country was in debt to the trivial amount of five millions of dollars, that was a sufficient reason for stopping this great national work. We had seen votes appropriating larger sums when the Treasury was in a much worse condition than at present. Mr. Y. then quoted various passages from the journal in support of his argument; and, after some further remarks from Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, and SMITH of Indiana,

The question was taken, Shall this bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading? and the yeas and nays being demanded, it was decided in the negative—ayes 20, noes 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Webster, White, Wright, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dixon, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, and Strange—22.

So the bill was lost.

A motion was then made that the Senate adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. BENTON hoped it would be withdrawn, as the Committee on Military Affairs were anxious that the bill providing for an increase of the military force in the suffering Territory of Florida should be taken up, and he proposed that the bill should be taken up to-morrow.

The motion to adjourn until Monday was sustained, and

The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, April 3, 1840.

Mr. GALBRAITH, by general consent, laid before the House certain documents in relation to the claim of Mary Brookhausen of Pennsylvania (now aged about 103 years) the widow of Captain Brookhausen deceased; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The CHAIR announced that the business first in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections, by Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman, to print all the testimony in relation to the New Jersey contested election; and the amendment to said resolution by Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, to discharge the committee from the further consideration of certain testimony now before it, for the purpose of having it printed.

Mr. FILLMORE, who was still entitled to the floor on the above question, defended the positions he had assumed in relation to the difference of opinion existing between the minority and the majority of the committee, as to their proceedings. He intimated that he wished to avoid any difficulty as to those differences of opinion. His object was then as it always had been, peace and harmony. Mr. F. having concluded his remarks, which will be published hereafter,

Mr. CRABB obtained the floor. He wished to say a few words, not because he felt himself implicated by any of the remarks which had been made by members of the majority. The matter had been so long discussed, that he felt the House should be relieved from further infliction by the debate; but he thought it due to his colleagues in the minority to say a few words.

Whatever might be the facts as to the reading of the evidence; whatever gentlemen might remember in regard to it, is not the important question. The burden of the complaint is not as to how much of the testimony was read, but that the committee did not give the testimony due weight. The journal shows the fact that a large portion of the testimony was excluded; and the report of the majority is based on who had the largest number of votes. In justice to his colleagues of the minority, Mr. C. would state what he recollected in regard to the fact of reading the evidence. They were for making a report in favor of those who held the certificates of the Governor, given in pursuance of law, believing it the highest evidence of return. Other gentlemen were in favor of a report made on a different basis. The testimony before the committee was read, just so far as was necessary to determine whether it was competent or not. In regard to the claimants who held the commissions, there was only one deposition read, as he remembered. Mr. C. examined the testimony himself thoroughly, so far as was material to bring his mind to a correct conclusion upon the points raised in committee. The question of legality of votes never was considered; the minority, in their report, had never asserted that the testimony was not read to determine its competency, but that it was not to be read with a view to its effect on the committee. The whole of it never was read, in fact, for any purpose; and little, if any, was ever read with a view to its effect upon any of the questions before the committee. None was read with a view to settle the legality of the votes polled, for that question was never examined by the committee with a view to its determination.

Mr. C. stated his course in reference to the testimony. He had voted against the admission of a large portion of it, adduced by both sides, under the circumstances, mainly with a view to afford an opportunity to the several persons claiming the contested seats to perfect their testimony. He believed it would have been the proper course for both the majority and minority of the committee to have submitted their reports to the House at the same time, that the matter might have gone forth to the country together with the evidence and journal of the committee. The members of the committee stood in a delicate position towards each other; and, in order to avoid differences between them, they should not have taken part in the debate, but left it to the other members of the House. Mr. C. said the report of the minority had been refused an introduction into the House until the majority report had been acted on. If gentlemen would refer to the journal of the 10th of March, previously to the decision of the House on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] they would see that the House did refuse to receive the minority report. It required a vote of two-thirds to receive it; and, in consequence, it was rejected. He said it should have been received, that the views of the minority might have their proper influence. If he was not satisfied that the House was tired of the subject, he would take it up and show the principles of action of the majority and minority, and the motives which actuated himself. But he proposed that the matter might here be closed, and therefore refrained from further remark.

Mr. CUSHING having obtained the floor, said he had sought it for some time in order to bring this discussion to a close. He begged leave to say that this debate, obstructing, as it did during the morning hour, the whole public business, had become a public nuisance. He moved the previous question. [Cries of "Good, good."]

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina appealed to Mr. CUSHING to withdraw the demand for only ten minutes; and he pledged himself not to occupy the House longer than that time.

Mr. WISE suggested that his colleague, [Mr. BOTTS,] a member of the committee, and who was very much interested in this matter in a personal view, was not present. Mr. W. did not know what the gentleman from South Carolina designed to say, but he hoped that, if it was any thing which required explanation or reply from his colleague, an opportunity would be given for reply. Mr. W. saw no reason why the debate should not be arrested now.

After some desultory conversation, Mr. CUSHING said that, as gentlemen all around him objected to his withdrawing the demand for the previous question, he must persist in it.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; which main question was on the adoption of the amendment and resolution.

Mr. RICE GARLAND proposed to modify his amendment to read as follows:

"And that the said committee be instructed to report the evidence referred to it on the 6th of March, which was delivered to the chairman of the committee previous to the report being adopted, and which the majority refused to open, or send to the Speaker to be opened, in order that it might be considered, and that the same be printed."

The SPEAKER ruled the modification out of order, because it contained a proposition irrelevant to the matter before the House.

Mr. R. GARLAND then withdrew it.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. G. as originally offered, and it was rejected.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee,

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina said he wished to see who would object to printing the testimony, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 147, nays 3.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. PICKENS, on leave, presented certain documents from the United States Consul at Canton, (Mr. Snow,) in addition to those already laid before the House, which, on motion of Mr. P. were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINCOLN, by the unanimous consent of the House, in behalf of his colleague, Mr. LAWRENCE, who is still confined to his room by sickness, presented the following petitions: The petition of Joseph Balch, president of the Merchants' Insurance Company, and the officers of numerous insurance companies, merchants, shipmasters, shipowners, and pilots, asking for an appropriation for the erection of a light house on Prescot's Rock, in the harbor of Boston; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Of John Lilly and others, manufacturers of umbrellas and parasols, asking to have the duty restored; which, by the adjudication of the courts, has been held not to be applicable to those articles when imported into the United States: referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Of Phebe Rogers, of Charlestown, Massachusetts, setting forth that her husband was a head rigger, in the employ of the Government, in the navy yard in Charlestown, when he fell from the foreyard of the ship Independence, and was killed: representing, also, her extreme poverty and distress, and asking a provision in her favor: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Of Elizabeth Sweatt, only surviving child of Benjamin Richards, representing that her father was in the service of his country on board the United States brig of war Pickering, in the year 1800, when the vessel was lost, with all on board, and praying that she may be admitted to a participation in the navy pension fund, to which she has been advised that she is entitled: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Of the heirs of Bartholomew Trose, late of Charlestown, Massachusetts, setting forth the meritorious services of their ancestor in the Revolutionary war, and praying compensation therefor: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Of Benjamin Lyons of Dorchester, Massachusetts, representing his Revolutionary services, and asking to be put upon the roll of Revolutionary Pensioners: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, it was resolved that the rules of the House, as amended, be printed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House further testimony in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which,

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Engrossed bill for the relief of John M. Jacqueline, was taken up on its third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Bailey and Delord, came up in order, on its third reading, when

Mr. DANA spoke a short time in favor of the bill.

Mr. HAND followed in favor of the bill, and offered an amendment, proposing to allow —— dollars, and —— per centage; and After some conversation between the SPEAKER and Mr. HAND, the question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion, the House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. DAVEE in the chair, on the bills on the private calendar, heretofore referred to it, from No. 57 to 75 inclusive; and after some time spent in the consideration of the same, the committee rose and reported all to the House without amendment, except the bill for the relief of James L. Cochran, the amendment to which was concurred in; and this bill, with all the others, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills from the Senate, included in those ordered to be engrossed, were read the third time and passed, viz:

An act for the relief of John H. Jacobs; and

An act for the relief of Alvarez Fisk, and the representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge.

On motion of Mr. R. GARLAND, engrossed bill for the relief of Mary Tucker was postponed.

Engrossed bill for the relief of Bailey and Delord, coming up for a third reading,

Mr. HAND spoke at some length, and showed that the bill, in its present form, would be of no utility. If there was justice in the case, of which there could be no doubt, he thought the House ought to do justice. These men made large advances to the Government, when its credit was very low, during the last war, and furnished the troops with supplies; and all the survivors asked was that they should be indemnified for the amount advanced. Mr. H. then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to report an amendment, allowing $20,000 to the claimants.

Mr. DAWSON said if it was the intention of the House to to change the character of the bill, he thought they had better adopt the amendment; but the committee which reported the bill were unanimous in the conclusions it had come to. The claim was founded on private debts incurred by the soldiers; and he thought it would be a bad principle to establish, to make the Government responsible for debts of that character.

Mr. HAND demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit; which were not, however, ordered.

The question was then taken on the proposition, and rejected; and the bill, as reported from the Committee of the Whole, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr L WILLIAMS,

Engrossed bill for the relief of the owners of the schooner Three Brothers, being put upon its passage,

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi demanded the yeas and nays; and upon dividing the House to ascertain whether there was a record, there were—ayes 15, nays 40, no quorum voting.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved a call of the House, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered; and were —yeas 73, nays 20.

So the House determined to have a call, and it was proceeded in till 123 answered to there names; when their being a quorum,

Mr. HOWARD moved to dispense with all further proceedings in the call; which was agreed to—yeas 58, nays 32.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill, and the question being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi said he would oppose the passage of any bill without a quorum of the House; and for the purpose of ascertaining whether there be a quorum, he called for tellers to take a count, which were ordered; and Messrs. THOMPSON of Mississippi, and STEWART having been appointed such, reported that there were—ayes 65, nays 25. No quorum having voted,

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi moved that the House adjourn; on which motion the yeas and nays were demanded; and being, ordered, were—yeas 28, nays 100.

So the House having refused to adjourn, and

The question again recurring on the passage of the above bill,

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 95, nays 30.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi called for tellers, and

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays.

After a few remarks by Mr. EVANS in favor of the bill, and Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi in opposition,

So the bill was passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, April 4, 1840.

Mr JONES of Virginia observed that the difficulties and delays which were daily pre ented in the way of the action of the House on the appropriation bills, the importance of which must be apparent to every one of the members of the House, induced him to ask leave to offer a resolution to bring one of them, at an early day, before the House. He would take occasion to say that it had heretofore been the practice of the House to make bills of this character the special order of the day for every day after one o'clock, till disposed of. In accordance with this practice, the resolution he wished to offer proposed to make the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill the special order for Wednesday next, to continue such every day after one o'clock till disposed of.

Mr. LINCOLN hoped the gentleman would not press his motion at present. It would give rise to debate, and prevent the committees from reporting, which they had had no opportunity of doing this session.

The resolution was then read.

Mr. BRIGGS asked, if the resolution passed, if the appropriation bills would not take precedence over all other business, and if the bill to prevent frauds on the revenue, which was made the special order for Tuesday next, would not be suspended by it.

The SPEAKER answered that the effect of the resolution, if adopted, would be to give the appropriation bills precedence over all other business. The SPEAKER then announced, that if no member objected, the resolution would be received by general consent.

Mr. STANLY rose and said that he objected.

Mr. JONES said he could not consent that the public business should be passed over in this way, without making some effort to prevent it; he therefore moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to submit the resolution, and on that motion, demand d the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 91, nays 31.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. J. then introduced his resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption; which was seconded, and the main question ordered; which main question was, "Shall the resolution be adopted?"

Mr. RUSSELL demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 107 nays 53.

CANAL TO CONNECT THE LAKES.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill granting to the State of Michigan a quantity of land to aid said State in the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Marie. The bil makes a donation to the State, for that purpose, of one hundred thousand acres of land.

Mr. NORVELL said that the proposed canal, when constructed, would connect the navigation of Lake Huron and the lower lakes with Lake Superior. It would not exceed a mile and a half to two miles in length. By surveys and estimates, the cost of the canal for navigation by sloops and schooners would not amount to more than about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. Two hundred thousand, or two hundred and fifty thousand dollars would render it navigable to steamboats. It was a great State work, eminently conducive to the prosperity of the commerce and fisheries of the northwest, and deserving, from its general and commercial character, of the patronage of the Federal Government. The bill was moderate in its demand. It asked only one hundred thousand acres of land to aid the State of Michigan in the construction of the proposed canal. It was unnecessary for him to dilate upon the importance of a work which all, who understood the geography and resources of that fertile and vast region of country, would duly appreciate.

Mr. BENTON observed, that the object of the bill was not only a good, but a great one. A canal opening a communication from the lower Lakes to Lake Superior—a lake, he believed, little, if at all, inferior to the Caspian sea—was a great work. It was second in importance only to the canal around the Falls of the Ohio. He desired to know from the Senator who had charge of the bill, what were the means for making this canal: whether it was to be a State work, or whether it was to be put into the hands of a company, or a corporation.

Mr. NORVELL replied, that the work was to be exclusively a State work. No company or corporation was to have any concern in it He would not himself ask a cent from Congress to aid any corporation, or any monopoly. And, if the Senator from Missouri desired any further assurance, he would have no objection to an amendment to the bill, making the proposed grant to the State, on the condition that the work should be made by her alone, and that she should be its sole owner. With regard to the means for the construction of the canal, he trusted that, by a judicious selection and sale of the land, it would of itself yield a sufficient sum to complete the work.

Mr. HENDERSON said, that he was decidedly in favor of making grants of land to the States for the purpose of constructing works of internal improvement. He should vote for the bill. He was only desirous of ascertaining whether it contained a provision preventing the sale of the land, under the minimum price fixed by law.

The bill was read containing such a provision, and was thereupon, without further debate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 6, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, covering copies of the correspondence heretofore called for in relation to the light-house on Flynn's knoll, &c.: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, sundry depositions in relation to the New Jersey election: referred to the Committee of Elections.

This was the day set apart, by the rules, for the reception of resolutions, &c.

At the adjournment of the House last resolution day, an appeal was pending from the decision of the Chair, and which was taken under the following circumstances:

In pursuance of notice given, Mr. RARIDEN had asked leave to introduce a bill providing for the continuation of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. DROMGOOLE at that time objected to the motion for leave being put, on the ground that he wished to debate it.

The SPEAKER thereupon decided that the motion for leave to introduce a bill must be subject to the restrictions and limitations contained in the rules in relation to resolutions, (that is to say, that any resolutions giving rise to debate must lie over;) and decided, therefore, that this motion for leave, giving rise to debate, must lie over.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to lay the motion for leave on the table.

Mr. RARIDEN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR that the motion for leave to introduce a bill, giving rise to debate must lie over.

And the question being on the appeal, the previous question, was moved and seconded, and, pending the main question, the House adjourned.

And the question this morning recurring on the appeal,

Mr. RARIDEN moved a call of the House.

The SPEAKER said the motion was not in order, pending the previous question; but that a call might be had by general consent.

Which having been obtained, the Clerk called the roll, when 117 members answered to their names.

And the names of the absentees having been called, 137 members were ascertained to be present.

When, on motion of Mr. BANKS, all further proceedings in the call were suspended.

And the main question (on the appeal) was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. CASEY asked the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

And the main question, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: yeas 119, nays 23.

So the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed.

And, thereupon, Mr. RARIDEN withdrew his motion for leave to introduce the said bill.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the States for resolutions, commencing where it was suspended on the last resolution day, to wit, the State of Indiana.

Mr. RARIDEN asked the House at this time to take up and consider a resolution heretofore offered by him, calling on the War Department for certain information in relation to the officers of the army employed in paying Indian annuities, &c.

Mr. BANKS objected.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS (remarking that the resolution was a very important one) asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were. yeas 71, nays 79.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. REYNOLDS, in pursuance of notice heretofore given, asked leave to introduce a bill granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands.

Objection being made,

Mr. R. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 67, nays 73.

So the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. CASEY,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the apportionment of the representation under the census of 1840, so as that the Representatives to the Twenty-seventh Congress may be made agreeably to said apportionment and census.

Mr. CRABB moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of taking up a resolution heretofore offered, providing for an amendment of the Constitution, by which the Presidential term shall be limited to four years.

Mr. C. having explained that his object was to have the resolution referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, asked the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rule; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 77, nays 61, not two-thirds.

So the rules were not suspended.

Numerous other motions were made to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up and considering different resolutions; all which motions were rejected by counts or divisions.

Mr. DOTY, in pursuance of notice, asked leave to introduce a bill to provide for the construction of harbors in Wisconsin.

Also, a bill in relation to the southern boundary of Wisconsin.

Objection was made in both cases.

Mr. DAVIS, of Kentucky, in pursuance of notice, asked leave to introduce a bill vesting the appointment of the district attorneys and marshals of the United States in certain courts thereof, and providing that the emoluments of the said attorneys shall in no case exceed $3,000.

Objection was made, but withdrawn.

And the question being put on leave, no quorum voted.

Mr. DAVIS then asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 60, nays 66.

So leave was refused.

Mr. W. O. BUTLER of Kentucky offered the following:

Resolved, That so much of the 27th rule of this House as requires the member addressing the CHAIR to confine himself to the question under discussion, and which for years past has been obsolete in practice, is essential alike to the progress of business, and the decorum of debate, and ought to be enforced.

Mr. B. disclaimed any intention to reflect upon the SPEAKER.

Mr. WISE made objection, but withdrew it.

Mr. BRIGGS proposed to amend the resolution so as to add to the end thereof the words, "and that this House will sustain the CHAIR in a rigid enforcement of all its rules."

Mr. DAWSON said that, as he supposed the object of the gentleman from Kentucky had been attained by offering the resolution, he (Mr. D.) would move to lay it on the table.

Mr. ATHERTON asked the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. ALFORD renewed the objection. The resolution contained a reflection on the SPEAKER, who was not answerable for the disorder of this House. Besides he (Mr. A.) did not wish to gag the Democracy.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested that the objection was now too late, and that the resolution had been received.

The SPEAKER decided the objection to be in order.

Mr. BUTLER thereupon moved a suspension of the rule, and asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, were: Yeas 74, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Bond, Boyd, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, W. O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Earll, Eastman, Fletcher, Hand, Hawkins, Henry, Hiller, Howard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Ramsey, Rariden, Rhett, Robinson, Samuels, John Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Stuart, Sweney, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Triplett, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, Watterson, Weller, Wick, and Jared W. Williams—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Williams, Lewis Williams, C H. Williams, and Wise—48.

So (two-thirds not voting therefor) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. WISE, (by general consent) presented the petition of one hundred and fifty citizens of the United States, praying for a revision of the punishment of Wm. L. McKenzie; which, on motion of Mr. W. was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ments of certain harbors, and had requested Mr. H. to ask leave on this day. Mr. H. said this bill was very economical, and merely for the purpose of preserving the works already in progress, and contemplated the appropriation of but a small part of the estimates of the topographical bureau.

Objection being made by Mr. TURNEY, the motion for leave lies over under the rule.

Mr. HAND also desired, if in order, to call up the consideration of the resolution introduced by him on the 10th February, to inquire into the expediency of constructing a military road from Lake Champlain to Lake Ontario. Mr. H. said recent occurrences rendered it proper to turn our eyes that way, and he wished the committee to have the matter under consideration.

The SPEAKER said it was in order to move its consideration, but it would require a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. HAND then so moved; but two-thirds not voting in favor, the motion to consider now was lost.

DEATH OF THE HON. THADDEUS BETTS.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The melancholy duty devolves upon me to announce to the Senate the death of my colleague, the Hon. THADDEUS BETTS, who departed this life this morning, a few minutes before six o'clock. I visited him yesterday at his lodgings, and though I was strongly impressed with the opinion of the malignancy of his disease, it did not seem to be the opinion of those around him that he was in any immediate danger. My own indisposition, I trust, will be a sufficient apology for the brevity of my remarks on this melancholy occasion. Mr. BETTS was a man of a high order of intellect, and of varied and extensive acquirements. The confidence of the people of his State in his abilities and worth, was manifested by the many elevated and important public trusts to which their voices called him, and he discharged their various duties with honor to himself, and satisfaction to the public. At the bar, few enjoyed a higher reputation, and the urbanity and courtesy which marked his intercourse with his professional brethren, made him a general favorite. In the relations of friend and citizen, the testimony of all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, will be given to the high estimation in which he was held.

And though all his acquaintances mourn his loss, none can feel their bereavement with such intensity as those who looked to him as their protector: the wife has lost in him a kind and devoted husband; the children a fond and affectionate father.

Mr. DAVIS then submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the Hon. THADDEUS BETTS, which will take place to-morrow, at half past 12 o'clock; that the Senate will attend the same, and that notice thereof be given to the House of Representatives.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. THADDEUS BETTS, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved unanimously, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. THADDEUS BETTS, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 7th, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1840.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th ultimo, I communicate herewith, accompanied by a report from the Secretary of War, "copies of the arrangement entered into between the Governor of Maine and Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, through the mediation of Major General Scott, in the month of March last, 1839, together with copies of the instructions given to General Scott, and of all correspondence with him relating to the subject of controversy between the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick."

Very respectfully

Your obedient servant,

M. VAN BUREN.

Honorable R. M. T. HUNTER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. CLIFFORD, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with an act of Congress of 28th June, 1834, enclosing a copy of a statement from the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, showing the result of the assays made at that Mint of the coins referred to in said act; which was read, and,

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. SWENEY said he on yesterday voted against granting leave to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to introduce a bill vesting the appointment of District Attorneys and Marshals of the United States, in certain courts thereof, and providing that the emoluments of the said attorneys shall, in no case, exceed $3,000. He had since learned that the bill was one of some importance; and he thought that it should, at least, be received and referred to an appropriate committee for examination. Some of the marshals, he was told, received at least $20,000 annually, by way of fees. Such should not be the case. He did not wish the motion to be decided at that time. He then made the motion to reconsider, and moved that the question thereon be postponed till Monday week; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made some remarks in relation to a memorial from numerous seamen, praying Congress to legislate for their relief, which had been referred to [illegible] committee. He said it was a subject which properly belonged to the Committee on Commerce. On his motion, the Committee on Foreign Affairs was discharged from its further consideration, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

This being the day specially set apart for the consideration of the bill to prevent frauds on the revenue, some conversation took place between Messrs. ADAMS, J. W. JONES of Virginia, and BROWN of Tennessee, as to the comparative importance of giving priority to the diplomatic appropriation bill, which had been made the special order of the day for Wednesday, in preference to the bill above; both of which special orders were necessarily postponed, in consequence of the melancholy event which is announced below. The subject was, however, disposed of by Mr. ADAMS, on whose motion the bill to prevent frauds on the revenue was made the special order of the day for Wednesday week.

Mr. HAND rose and said that he asked the indulgence of the House to allow him to offer a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for his plan for the permanent defence of the Northern and Northeastern frontier. Mr. H. said his colleague [Mr. FILLMORE,] yesterday offered a resolution of inquiry of the President, but that, as to the defences on our side, he believed embraced only the present "preparations" of our Government. He had also been informed that the Military Committee here sent an inquiry to the Secretary, but that was rather confined to estimates of expenses. Now, Mr. H. desired to see the general plan of the Secretary for our permanent defence. He believed that as to the Western frontier, one had been already submitted, and he was informed that one had been matured for the Northern and Northeastern. That he desired should be communicated to this House, and through it to the nation, that action could be had understandingly, and in any manner that might be thought judicious.

Mr. H. then offered the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House what works he considers necessary to be constructed in order to place the Northern and Northeastern frontiers in a proper and permanent state of defence.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina was understood to object to the resolution.

Mr. WISE said he yesterday offered a resolution, which he thought no gentleman would have objected to, calling on the Secretary of War to give to the House a connected system of defences for all our exposed territory. That resolution, however, was not considered. Now, he apprehended that if we should go to war with Great Britain for the sake of this Aroostook country, that that would not be the point attacked. No; the great point of attack would be the seaboard cities. New York would be struck and laid under contribution; so, also, would New Orleans, Philadelphia, and Boston; and he might be be permitted to say, that with his knowledge of our present means of defence, one single steam frigate, with her gun amid ships, would sink the great ship Pennsylvania with one shot. and that three such steam ships would be sufficient to lay any of our seaboard cities under contribution. It would require 11,000 guns to man our fortifications, and we had not, he believed, 1,100. He was for calling on the Secretary of War for a plan for the defence of the whole country, and not for a single portion of it.

Mr. HAND then moved for a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer his resolution. He did not see how the gentleman from Virginia could have any objection to the introduction of the resolution, as it would be open to amendment.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 42, there being two-thirds in the affirmative, which were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chittenden, Clifford, Colquitt, Conner, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earll, Eastman, Ely, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Galbraith, James Garland, Granger, Hall, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Henry, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kempshall, Leet, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, Mallory, Marvin, Mitchell, Montgomery, Newhard, Ogle, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Prentiss, Reynolds, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweney, Philip F. Thomas, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Vroom, Peter J. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Bell, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Albert G. Brown, Chapman, Chinn, Coles, Jas. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dillet, Edwards, Rice Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Griffin, Grinnel, Habersham, W. S. Hastings, Hawes, Charles Johnston, King, McCarty, Nisbet, Palen, Preffit, Randolph, Rariden, Russell, Shepard, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Triplett, Trumbull, John White, and Lewis Williams—42.

Mr. HAND then submitted his resolution, which was read; and before taking the question on which, however,

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, announcing the death of the Hon. THADDEUS BETTS, late a Senator from Connecticut; which having been read,

Mr. OSBORNE, of Connecticut, then rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The sudden and unexpected death of my distinguished friend, which has just been announced to the House, has filled my heart with grief so overwhelming, that I can hardly trust myself to pay the usual tribute to his memory. He has been taken from his friends, from society, and from the councils of the nation, in the meridian of his usefulness, and the fulness of his intellect.

I cannot here attempt to sketch the character or do justice to the eminent talents and manly virtues of my deceased friend. He was distinguished for acuteness of intellect, vigor of understanding, and soundness of judgment, no less than for the nobleness of his soul and the probity of his life.

The deceased was educated to the profession of law, and was early brought in contact with the most eminent men that have ever adorned the bar of New England. It is sufficient to say that he sustained and distinguished himself among such men as Daggett, Sherman, Smith, and Sherwood.

In all the relations of life, his character was marked with honor and integrity. He had filled many important public trusts in his own State, and was at length called to represent her in the higher branch of the National Legislature. Had his life been preserved, he would have become one of its most useful and distinguished members. But Connecticut has again been called to mourn the loss of a distinguished citizen and Senator. Let us bow with submission to the dispensations of Providence.

This is not the place to indulge in private griefs. I will only say, that a wife has lost a husband, children have lost a father, and a wide circle have lost a friend; their only consolation is in the hopes and promises of that religion of which the deceased was, I trust, a sincere professor.

Mr. O. concluded by offering the following resolution:

Resolved, unanimously, That this House will attend the funeral of the Hon. THADDEUS BETTS, late a member of the Senate from the State of Connecticut, to-morrow, at half past 12 o'clock; and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning, and wear crape for thirty days.

Which was unanimously adopted; when,

On motion of Mr. STORRS, from Connecticut, as a further testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased,

The House adjourned till to-morrow morning, at 12½ o'clock.

Mr. R. also submitted a preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine in favor of a general bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PORTER presented a memorial of a number of citizens of the United States, in favor of establishing a communication between the valley of the Ohio river and the Oregon Territory; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory.

Mr. KING presented the petition of a number of citizens of township 20, range 3 west, in Sumpter county, Alabama, praying to locate a section of land for the use of schools in lieu of one of which they have been deprived; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ALLEN presented a preamble and resolutions passed by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law authorizing the sale of the public lands lying adjacent to the lands hitherto granted to that State for the construction of canals; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Jubal B. Hancock, made a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Mary Linn, widow of David Linn, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the Committee on the Library to take measures for the importation of the statue of Washington by Greenhow; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred House bill for the relief of Nathan Levy, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of John Johnston, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BANK OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Bank of the District of Columbia; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

[The bill provides, that John P. Van Ness, Thos. Carbery, George Parker, Francis S. Key, John Boyle, William A. Bradley, Thomas Blagden, Benjamin O. Tayloe, William Gunton, John P. Ingle, George Thomas, John Carter, E. M. Linthicum, John Kurtz, Phineas Janey, Henry Dangerfield, and John C. Vowel, shall act as commissioners to receive subscriptions to the stock of the Bank of the District of Columbia, with a capital of two millions of dollars, divided into shares of fifty dollars each, to be located in the city of Washington, with branches in Georgetown and Alexandria, the charter to expire in 1855. The charters of the present banks of the District are extended until ninety days after the new bank shall go into operation.]

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate will not consider or discuss any bill for the renewal of a bank charter in the District of Columbia, while the said bank refuses to pay specie for its notes and deposites, or circulates notes of any banks so refusing.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation of money to enable the President of the United States to negotiate for the extinction of the Indian titles to the residue of the lands in the upper peninsula of Michigan, claimed by the aborigines of that peninsula.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to send to the Senate all the papers, or copies of papers, in his Department, relating to the claims of James Allen to a pre-emption right in the State of Missouri.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. HUBBARD was considered and agreed to.

The bill granting to the county of Kalamazoo, in the State of Michigan, the right of pre-emption to a quarter section of land, and for other purposes; and were severally read a third time and passed.

The bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof,

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to raise one thousand five hundred men, to serve against the Florida Indians, was, on motion of Mr. PIERCE, recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill granting to the State of Michigan a quanty of land to aid said State in the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Marie, coming up on its third reading,

Mr. MERRICK demanded the yeas and nays on its passage.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that this bill had very quietly progressed to its present position, but as yet he had not heard a single word by way of argument in its favor. He would like to hear from the friends of the bill some reason for the grant of this vast quantity of the public domain.

Mr. NORVELL said that if the Senator had been present when the bill was considered in committee, and ordered to be engrossed, he would have heard various reasons adduced in its favor, and such as appeared satisfactory to all the Senators who were present. He would, however, consent that the bill should be postponed for the present, to give Senators time to make themselves acquainted with its provisions, but would call it up at a very early day.

The bill was then informally passed over.

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas to institute procee'ings to try the validity of their claims," approved the twenty sixth of May, eighteen hundred and twenty-four, and an act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said acts to claimants to land wi hin the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, being taken up as in Committee of the Whole, was discussed by Messrs. LINN, GRUNDY, SEVIER, BENTON, MOUTON, KING, CLAY of Kentucky, and HENDERSON; and after various amendments had been adopted, the bill, as amended, was ordered to be printed.

The Senate then went into Executive business,

And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, April 9, 1840.

The journal having been read:

Mr. LINCOLN asked the unanimous leave of the House, in behalf of his colleague, Mr. ABBOT LAWRENCE, still confined to his room by sickness, to submit a communication from the Hon. Thomas H. Perkins of Boston, and a great number of the merchants of Boston and Salem, Massachusetts, interested in the China trade, containing a statement of intelligence recently received from that country, which has not before been made publicly known, with a view to the reference of the communication to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Leave being granted, Mr. LINCOLN presented the communication; and upon his motion, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the resolution of the gentleman from New York, Mr. HAND, for the introduction of which the rules had been suspended on Tuesday last; but the action on which had been suspended by the annunciation of the death of a member of the other body; which resolution was in the following words:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House what works he considers necessary to be constructed in order to place the Northern and Northeastern frontiers in a proper and permanent state of defence.

Mr. WISE reqested Mr. HAND to accept, as a substitute therefor, or, if not as a substitute, as a modification, the following resolution offered by Mr. W. on Monday last:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to lay before this House, as soon as practicable, a report of a full and connected system of national defence, embracing steam and other vessels of war, and "floating batteries" for coast and harbor defence; and national foundries, and the internal means auxiliary to these for transportation and other warlike uses by land; and that he be requested to furnish this House with the reports submitted to his Department, at any time, by Major General Edmund P. Gaines, or other person, or persons, of professional experience, of their "plans of defence," if any such have been submitted, with the views of the Secretary of War thereon. And that the Secretary furnish an estimate of the expenses of his own and other plans he may report, distinguishing such parts of plans as ought to be immediately adopted and prosecuted, with the probable cost and time of their prosecution and commencement.

Mr. HAND said he had no particular objection to that resolution, as an addition; but the whole plan might not be prepared, and he wished it so passed as to avoid delay. If it was added as a substantive resolution, the Secretary might send that portion relating to the Northern and Northeastern frontier at once.

Mr. WISE then moved his resolution, by way of amendment, as an additional one; which was understood to be accepted by Mr. HAND as a modification of his.

The question then being on the resolution as modified,

Mr. WISE said that his resolution embraced an entire system of national defence—a system which, it seemed to him, ought to have been entered on long ago. This Government, he would venture to say, in the face of a threatened war, was in the most defenceless condition of any in the world. There was not a power on earth, civilized or barbarous, with a tithe of the physical force which this country could employ, that had not now in active operation more means of defence than we. In fact, our condition was worse than if we had never spent a dollar on our system of fortifications. There was scarcely a fort on our seaboard that was not in a condition to be taken by the enemy, and to be used against ourselves, instead of being a fort for our own defence. He would not now go into the inquiry whose fault it was, from the time that we had the celebrated excitement on the three million appropriation down to this moment, when we stood now in the presence of the British lion himself—he would not now stop to inquire who was to blame for the helpless condition of our country, left, as it was, to the mercy of any foe that possessed maritime power. He would not now stop to comment on the utter, reckless folly of talking of a war with Great Britain about a few pine logs in Maine, when our commerce, our national honor, our lives, and every portion of our frontier, we exposed to British aggression and British bayonets.

Mr. HAND said, that on this subject he was no alarmist. He well knew the deep injury that our commercial interests might sustain by an exciting and injudicious debate there. All he desired now was, that the House might be fully informed on this important subject.

Mr. WISE. I am no alarmist. I have no idea that there is to be a war. But I go for the necessity of fortifications upon the most liberal scale for a peace establishment.

Mr. HAND said he had not supposed this resolution would interrupt the regular business of the House by debate. The answers to this and the other calls on the President and Departments, and probably the report of the Military Committee, would soon be in, and then would, he thought, be the time for discussion, and he felt constrained again to move the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS appealed to Mr. HAND to withdraw his motion for the previous question.

Mr. HAND was understood to insist on his call for the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS said he wished to say a word on this subject, because he found that there was among his own constituents, and among that portion of the people of this country who were now, by the act of God, deprived of the services of their immediate Representative, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] much anxiety in relation to it. He concurred perfectly in the opinion last expressnd by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] He thought that there was not the slightest danger at this moment of a war with Great Britain, nor for years to come. He (Mr. A.) said not for years to come, and he hoped this statement would be reported to his constituents, and to those next to his own district—the people of the city of Boston, who were probably as deeply interested in the preservation of peace with Great Britain as any portion of the people of the United States.

Mr. RHETT rose to inquire of the SPEAKER whether the demand for the previous question was or was not withdrawn?

Mr. HAND was understood to say he had not withdrawn it.

Mr. ADAMS regretted, he said, that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] was unwilling to hear that there was no danger of a war with Great Britain. The previous question had been withdrawn, and he hoped he would not be again interrupted.

Mr. RHETT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAND] says he has not withdrawn the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HAND said he had not withdrawn it, but would do so on the promise of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] to renew it.

After some confusion, cries to order, &c.

Mr. ADAMS was understood to say that he would renew it, and spoke in substance as follows, (as published in the National Intelligencer.)

He stated, for the benefit of his constituents, and of the immediate neighborhood of his constituents, and of the people of the whole country, that he did not apprehend, in the slightest degree, that there was any immediate danger of a war with Great Britain, or for years to come. And he founded this opinion on two things: In the first place, he founded it on the message of the President of the United States at the commencement of the present session, in which he (Mr. A.) thought there was not a single word of recommendation to the people to prepare themselves for that great and terrible conflict which must ensue whenever we came in conflict with Great Britain. From the day he saw that message, he concluded in his own mind that there was no danger of a war with Great Britain. And why? Because he was sure that, if the President of the United States himself had the slightest apprehension of danger of an immediate or early collision, it would have been wrong in him not to have recommended very strong and extensive preparations for that event. When, after that message was delivered, he (Mr. A.) saw weeks upon weeks pass away under an apprehension on the part of the citizens of the United States and of many of the members of this House that there was danger of war; when he saw the correspondence which had taken place (and which had from time to time been communicated to Congress) between the Secretary of State and the British Minister here—he confessed he had waited to see on what ground it was that the President of the United States had concluded that there was not the slightest danger of a collision with Great Britain at present.

When the last correspondence was communicated to the Senate—and when a gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in this House [Mr. PICKENS] sounded the alarm—an alarm which had pervaded the whole country—he [Mr. A.] felt a degree of concern and apprehension himself, not then having seen the correspondence. But the very next morning he saw it; and, in the last letter from the Secretary of State to the British Minister, he saw the grounds upon which the President had come to such a conclusion, and very safely come to it. That correspondence, as all must have observed, has been of an irritating character. There was anger, passion, feeling, upon both sides; and the community and many members of Congress, seeing these expressions of irritation, probably came to the conclusion, unnecessarily as he thought, that there was danger of an immediate collision.

He, as soon as he saw the last letter of the Secretary of State, became satisfied that there was no such danger; for, in the very heat and tempest of the passion, the Secretary of State broke off, and said that, from the day on which the President of the United States entered upon the duties of his station, he had determined that, in the event of the two parties not being able to come to an understanding by means of their negotiations, he would propose a reference of the great question at issue, for the second time, to a third party. To this the very natural reply of the British Minister was, that this was a new proposition, which he could only communicate to his Government, as he would immediately do. And that was the position in which the matter now stood. One of two things must be: either there was a proposition already on the part of Great Britain to accept a proposition heretofore made on the part of the Government of the United States—and that, of course, would necessarily prevent collision,—or the Government of Great Britain must determine whether it would accept of this proposition for a reference. Now, he said that the Government of Great Britain could not refuse this proposition; and when the question was referred to a third power, we should have no war from that time forward until at any rate the arbitrators had come to a decision, which would take years.

There was one other possibility which might induce collision; which was, that, while these negotiations were going on, the British Government might continue to encroach on the territory of the United States as they were doing, and had been doing ever since this matter had approached to the appearance of hostility between the two countries. This was possible—nay, probable. On the other hand, we had, on the part of the people of Maine, manifestations of a spirit not to submit, for any great length of time, to these continual encroachments—partially denied—partially, so to speak, prevaricated away in the correspondence between the British Minister and the Secretary of State; but still going on in the disputed territory, in which the British authorities might continue to advance until they had all they claimed, and probably a great deal more. It remained for the people of Maine to decide whether they would submit to it or not. He believed they would submit to these encroachments, and that there would be no act on the part of this Government to sustain or support them if they did not submit. He gave warning to the Representatives from Maine and Massachusetts in this House that the people of Maine would submit so long as it pleased the Government of Great Britain to pursue them under this course of negotiation to be resumed by a second reference. He presumed, however, that many of the Representatives of the State of Maine understood the feelings of their people better than he did.

Mr. A. then alluded to the course of the Government of Maine during the last spring—against which, Mr. A. said, he would not at the time consent to the adoption of any proposition which even by imputation could cast censure upon the Governor for his conduct. But, more recently, he (Mr. A.) had seen evidences of an exceedingly cool and tame spirit coming from the State of Maine. He did not mean to say this was not very proper under the circumstances of the times; but he had satisfied himself that there was no sort of danger to be apprehended from any act of the people of that State. The Legislature of Maine declared at that time that if the Government of the United States did not take the matter up, they would do justice to themselves. Now they declared that if the British went on encroaching there, and prevaricating here, as they had done and were doing, they would call on the Government of the United States to protect them.

Mr. SMITH of Maine. What else, sir, did they say—that if the General Government did not protect them, they would protect themselves?

Mr. A. said, all he intended to say was what he did not think any member from Maine would contradict, that, in the event of a second reference to a third power, the people of Maine would not commence a war with Great Britain; if any one did contradict it, let the two statements be put side by side.

Mr. A. SMITH said it was not his feeling, nor the feeling of the people of Maine, that this question should be again submitted to a reference in the manner or at all under the terms upon which it was submitted by a former Administration.

Mr. ADAMS said the gentleman was very cautious in his declaration that the people would not submit to another reference. He (Mr. A) declared they would submit to it, and he said that they ought to submit to it in case the event should come: and one of his chief motives in addressing the House at this time was to say that he approved entirely of this determination on the part of the President of the United States. He thought the Chief Executive of this country was authorized to make such a reference, and he was gratified to find such a determination had been formed; for nothing could be more effectual in preventing that collision which many of them, and he among the number, were so apprehensive of. He believed it was the most pacific and conciliatory course which could have been determined upon; for that reason he approved of it, and it would be approved by the whole of the civilized race of mankind. It came precisely to that point in reference to which so many petitions had been brought into this House, and to which he wished the House had paid more attention—that was to say, a general principle which, by the force of public opinion, should compel all Governments in the world to resort to this pacific mode of settling difficulties rather than by a resort to war. The two nations—the British people and the people of the United States—he might say unanimously, for he scarcely believed there was a man but who deprecated a war between the two nations—all deprecated a resort to war. The reference of the question to arbitrators was an honorable mode of proceeding; no nation could refuse to adopt such a course. The British Government, he maintained, must compulsively, whether they would or not, accept the proposition; and if not compelled, they would do it from motives of policy; and therefore he concluded there was no danger of a war. The only doubt he could entertain would be that the people of Maine, in the impatience and impetuosity which they must naturally feel for their own interests and their own rights, might, by their own indiscretion, commence hostilities. He did not, however, apprehend such an event, nor did he still believe that any member would rise and say that there was danger of war from that source.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said he had listened with profound attention to the remarks of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, touching a question of absorbing interest to the people of Maine, and he confessed his inability to comprehend them. Mr. S. was so unfortunate as to misapprehend the tenor of those remarks, or they embraced propositions wholly inconsistent with each other. The gentleman had said, that, when this question was agitated in the last Congress, and the conduct of the Government of Maine, in calling out the military force of the State to repel the invaders of her soil, was the subject of animadversion, he had been among the foremost to defend the course which Maine had pursued. He had not suffered the slightest reproach to be cast upon her. Maine had done precisely as she should have done under the circumstances. There was a palpable invasion of her territory, and she had acted nobly in repelling it. But the gentleman seems now to think that the peace of the country may be preserved, if Maine, by some act of indiscretion and rashness, do not disturb it. The territory of the State, solemnly and repeatedly declared to be so by the National Government—known to be so by Great Britain herself—was now in the occupation of foreign troops. The soil of Maine, the gentleman from Massachusetts declares, is, at this moment, encroached by British troops, and that such encroachment will be continued and persisted in by Great Britain, and quietly submitted to by the United States, unless the people or Government of Maine, by some act of indiscretion or rashness, intercept our peaceable relations with that country! And the gentlemen tells us furthermore, that the proper course to adjust the question, is to propose another reference, which he says Great Britain will not and cannot refuse, and which it will take years to bring it to an issue—and he then tauntingly gives notice to the people of Maine, that although pending this reference, the encroachments of England will be continued, they must and will quietly and peaceably submit to them, and that any resistance on their part will be rash and indiscreet, and tend to involve the country in a war!

Mr. S. repelled this idea of passive obedience and non-resistance on the part of Maine. There had been nothing in the course of her Government to justify it. Mr. S. called upon the gentleman from Massachusetts to point out the "tame spirit" of which he pretended to have seen recent evidence in that State. The resolutions very lately adopted by her Legislature were, in letter and spirit, wholly at variance with tameness or servility. And Mr. S. assured the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the country, that no attachment to party would be suffered to swerve the people of that State from a persevering and determined maintenance of their constitutional and unalienable rights.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts, who came forward so honorably to sustain the military operations of Maine, in the last Congress, upon the ground that they were justifiable, seems now to think that a similar course on her part would be rash and indiscreet, and that it is her duty to submit to the continued encroachments of England for years to come. Mr. S. was wholly unable to comprehend the distinction between an invasion of Maine last year, and a military occupation the present year. And he assured the gentleman that the people of Maine would not understand it. The same regard for the honor of their State—for the integrity of its territory—for their own character as American citizens—which prompted the people of Maine to resist and repel the invasion of her soil upon a former occasion, still existed. They had the same distinguished gentleman at the head of the Government; and the people of this country might be assured that he would never permit the State over which he presided to be disgraced by foreign encroachments. The gentleman from Massachusetts had spoken in high terms of that functionary. Mr. S. expressed his thanks to the gentleman for the just manner in which he had spoken of the Governor of Maine. As a Representative of the people of that State, and as a personal friend of that distinguished individual, he tendered him his unfeigned thanks.

Mr. S. had the fullest assurance that the rights of Maine were duly regarded by the National Administration. He had never doubted the disposition of the Executive to extend the protection of the nation over the entire territory of that State; and he had unshaken confidence in the patriotism of the people of the whole country to sustain the Government in every measure necessary for the accomplishment of that purpose. He did not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts in regard to the tone of the correspondence last communicated to Congress between the Secretary of State and the British Minister. He considered the letter of the Secretary, in reply to the British Minister, an able, dignified, and statesmanlike paper, and a most triumphant vindication of the rights of Maine, and the action of her Government in regard to the boundary question, and, at the same time, evinced the full determination of the Government of the nation to sustain and defend them. It was such a paper as was to have been expected from the source from which it emanated.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had spoken of a reference as the proper mode of adjusting and finally settling this vexed question. In regard to that matter, Mr. S. believed he expressed the views of the whole people of Maine, when he stated that they would never consent to a reference in the manner, and under the terms, upon which the question was referred under a former Administration. But Maine had set up no claim to territory, the justice of which she was not willing to submit to the strictest scrutiny. She was willing that the line designated by the treaty of 1783, between her territory and the British provinces, should be run and marked, and finally settled by disinterested and scientific individuals, who should be required to go upon the territory with the treaty, and perform this service. To such a reference, Mr. S. believed Maine would not object. Any other, instituted upon terms which would render a just decision less certain, she would most strenuously resist.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said that the information sought in the resolution had been communicated informally to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that it was now before that committee for the purpose of being acted upon. He was understood to say that he thought the best plan would be to have the matter referred to the committee, that they might report upon it, and that the whole might be printed. Still, however, he would not raise any special objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. T. then proceeded to make some remarks on the question to which the resolution looked. He thought there was no reason for this haste. He would say that the conduct of the General Government in regard to Maine met his entire approval. He was rejoiced to hear the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS;) speaking out as all would have expected him to do, not only with the spirit and manliness of an American patriot, but with the wisdom of an American statesman. He (Mr. T.) had not recently believed there was any danger of war, though he did believe so at the last session of Congress. He believed that in the condition in which the matter now stood, war was impossible. Great Britain must accede to the proposition as made; if not, she would accede to it with certain modifications. He would say here, that whilst it was the duty of this Government to speak the language of kindness and protection to Maine, it was its duty also to speak the language of firmness, nay somewhat of sternness, to the authorities of Maine. He knew how deeply exciting a matter a contest for territory was; but whilst Maine was given to understand that we intended to protect her rights and give her the land (as to her right to which he had no earthly doubt) or an equivalent for it—still he wished her to understand that, if a war came, it was our war. We took the matter out of her hands, and if we were to have a war, it was but right that we should have the negotiation too. It was too absurd to think of the State of Maine talking of fighting Great Britain. He repeated, as the war would be ours, if there was any, let us also have the negotiation.

Mr. T. was not disposed to act upon the matter of fortifications now, at all events. If there was to be a war, or a reasonable chance of a war—if there was one chance in one thousand that would justify putting the country in a condition to meet it, we could not arm too speedily nor too closely. If not, we could not spend too little in that way, for we had too little to spend And if, when advices had been received from England, they should not be altogether pacific, and such as would justify the confident anticipation of peace, he was then ready to arm the country, not so much on the point of danger as of national honor. He was not willing to treat with Great Britain while British bayonets and British fortifications were scattered along the whole line of our coast; he desired to treat with arms in his hands. But he was not disposed to accelerate that state of things, or to create additional fever temper in relation to this question. Six months would put us in a condition to resist any aggression; nay, he believed we might resist it without any fortifications at all. We had, thank God, the same means which enabled General Jackson to meet the enemy on the plains of Louisiana. We had the same means of protection—the same stout hearts and strong hands in the freemen of this country.

Mr. T. repelled the idea of invasion of the American soil, and insisted that we had already fortifications which, for a very little money, and in a few weeks, would put the country in a condition successfully to resist at ack. This led to some cross-questioning between Mr. T. and Mr. WISE, as to the state of the fortifications of the country.

After which, Mr. HAND moved the previous question.

And there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken; and, being taken, was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the condition of the banks of the United States; which, on motion of Mr. JONES, of Virginia, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES also moved that 2,000 copies extra be printed; which motion lies over, under the rule.

2. Letter from the Second Auditor's office of the Treasury Department, transmitting copies of such accounts as have been rendered by persons charged or interested with the disbursement or application of moneys, or goods, or effects, for the benefit of the Indians, from the 1st of October, 1838, to the 30th of September, 1839, inclusive, &c.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS of Indiana, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which, on motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BOND rose and asked leave of the House to make a personal explanation. And leave was granted; which explanation is copied from the Intelligencer, as follows:

[The following remarks were written out by Mr. BOND, the Reporter not having heard them with sufficient accuracy even to attempt a report of them. Personal explanations, at the best, are difficult and dangerous things for Reporters to meddle with—and are becoming insuperably so.]—Nat. Int.

Mr. BOND rose, and after addressing the Chair, said: I beg permission of the House, before proceeding with the business of the day, to allow me a few moments for a matter of personal explanation. It relates to an account of a debate in which I participated last Thursday, and which is published in the Globe of Saturday evening. I intended on Tuesday morning, as the same subject would then have come up for consideration, to ask this permission; but the melancholy event of that day postponed all business until this moment.

I will first use this occasion to say that I never expected to be truly represented in the Globe. Independent of the constant habit of that paper to traduce me, I have long since incurred the displeasure of one of its Reporters here by calling the attention of this House, in 1838, to the abuse of public patronage in suffering him to absent himself from his place in one of the Departments, in which he held the office of a clerk. The account of the debate, as given in the Globe, suppresses much that I said, and represents me as first introducing in the debate the character and veracity of the Editors of the Ohio Statesman.* It was my purpose to be content with pronouncing the article from that paper giving an account of the Whig Convention at Columbus as false and groundless. My colleague, [Mr. MEDILL,] in speaking of the Editors of that paper, said he had never heard their veracity questioned. It was in answer to this that I felt obliged to introduce the name of one of them, and state what I had seen published about him.

And when I spoke of one hundred and sixty lies appearing in one part of that statement, it was also in answer to what my colleague [Mr. MEDILL] had said when he selected, as an evidence of the truth of the article, the names of the delegates to that convention from Muskingum county. I had seen it stated in a paper printed in that county, that the article in question contained one hundred and sixty lies in reference to those delegates, and so I stated to the House. But I wish to call the attention of my colleague to what he is represented as having said on the occasion.

Mr. BOND here read several passages from the Globe, and then proceeded. I desire my colleague to say whether he used this language, or these ideas.

Mr. MEDILL said he would answer when his colleague had finished his remarks.

Mr. BOND observed that he desired to treat his colleague with perfect respect; but wished his answer now.

Mr. MEDILL said, that if his colleague preferred he should answer now, he had certainly no objections to do so. With the order or arrangement of the debate, as reported in the Globe, he had nothing to do, nor was he prepared to say whether it was correct or not. He had not heard the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. MASON,] and was satisfied that his colleague [Mr. BOND] had spoken last, although he might also have commenced the debate. Much allowance should be made for the Reporters, when there is any noise or confusion in the House, and if they succeed in giving the substance of what is said, there is no cause of complaint. He would not undertake to say at this length of time whether his own remarks, made on the occasion, were given verbatim or not, nor would he now stop to tax his recollection, or that of his friends, to ascertain the fact. He made no immaterial issues. He had only to say to his colleague, that until the language employed towards an absent citizen of his own State, and which prompted their utterance at the time, was withdrawn, he endorsed them precisely as reported, and held himself responsible accordingly.

*The Reporter for the Globe regrets that he is again under the necessity of intruding himself on the public in self-defence. Mr. BOND of Ohio has not only assailed the correctness of his report, but his motives; and attributes what he calls a "garbled report," to the displeasure he had incurred of one of the Globe's reporters. Now, the Reporter who is particularly assailed, is under the necessity of taking issue with Mr. BOND directly on this point. How does the member know that he has incurred the displeasure of the humble individual he thus thoughtlessly charges with improper motives? Is he conscious of having done the Reporter wrong, or has he any acquaintance with him, or knowledge of his character, directly or indirectly, which warrants the belief that he harbors vindictive or illiberal feelings? The Reporter assures Mr. BOND, and every gentleman of the Opposition party, that he has no desire to misrepresent them, and that he cannot possibly see what advantage it would be to him, or to his party, to do so. Anxious to retain the reputation of a faithful reporter of debates, which he believes that he has earned by many years of painful toil in the other hall of the legislative body, the Reporter strives, according to his best ability, to give to the public a faithful account of what passes in the House of Representatives. He does not pretend to give a verbatim report of every thing that is said in the discursive debates which so often occur. If he had as many hands as BRIAREUS he could not do it; and though gentlemen have a right to expect of him, in writing out their set speeches, to report them as nearly verbatim as possible, neither they nor the public would be served by setting down, word for word, every political skirmish that takes place. And now to the matter of which Mr. BOND particularly complains. The Reporter declares, most solemnly, that he had no intention to do that gentleman wrong, or to misrepresent him before the public. He believes now—and the very statement of Mr. BOND bears him out in it—that he reported, in substance, every material idea he advanced, and he did not pretend to do more. It is readily admitted that Mr. BOND did get up before Mr. MASON, and pronounce the statement read by Mr. WATTERSON, from the Ohio Statesman, to be false. But this omission was wholly without any design, and cannot possibly convey a wrong impression, for it is stated in the report that Mr. MASON and Mr. BOND both contradicted it. In the remarks attributed to Mr. BOND, as well as to his colleague, if there are any ideas conveyed that are not correct, the Reporter will cheerfully insert the correction; but he does not understand that any such charge is made. Indeed, if there was any fault at all in the brief sketch of Mr. BOND's remarks, it was in softening the harsh language he used; and they who believe in the truth of that Scripture, "blessed are the peace makers," will hardly censure the Reporter for that venial error. With regard to the remarks of Messrs. MEDILL and WELLER, they are correct in substance, though they may not be literally the words used. These gentlemen being satisfied, no one else has a right to complain.

An explanation is now necessary in relation to a further charge made by Messrs. BOND and GRAVES, that one of the Reporters for the Globe being a clerk in one of the public offices, is permitted to absent himself from his duties during the session of Congress, drawing his salary at the same time. A few words, it is believed, will be sufficient to satisfy others, if not these two gentlemen, that in this transaction there is nothing wrong, and that no injury has accrued to the public service in consequence of it. Owing to the impossibility of Messrs. BLAIR and RIVES procuring a competent Reporter, the individual who is now serving them in that capacity, out of a sincere desire to serve them, as well as to contribute all in his power towards the dissemination of correct intelligence, was induced to apply to the head of the office in which he served, General WHITCOME, for a furlough during the session of Congress. This permission has been granted for the two or three sessions past, but always on the condition of putting a competent clerk in the place thus temporarily vacated. At the commencement of this session, General WHITCOME granted the furlough with great reluctance; and it was only on ascertaining, to his entire satisfaction, that the duties of the station were in such a condition that a new clerk could discharge them, that he granted it. So far from the Reporter absenting himself from his duties while they are unperformed, or he, or Messrs. BLAIR and RIVES, deriving any pecuniary benefit from the transaction, the contrary is the fact. A clerk who writes a rapid and beautiful hand, and who is every way competent, has been appointed to fill the vacated situation for the session of Congress; and this clerk has received, for each and every month, one hundred dollars in specie, the whole amount of the salary attached to the office, BLAIR and RIVES paying the Reporter a higher salary. Ample proof of these facts the Reporter is ready to show to any one who wishes to see it. It may be asked what object the Reporter has in undertaking a laborious and thankless employment, besides the increase of pay he receives from BLAIR and RIVES. He answers, a grateful sense of benefits received, which never can be forgotten while his heart continues to beat. BLAIR and RIVES gave him employment when he was in distress, and with it they gave him double the compensation he received from his former employers, since which time he has received every evidence of their friendship and confidence.

LUND WASHINGTON, JR.

April 10 1840.

Mr. BOND replied that he would now make a few words answer his purpose. My colleague did not use the language, nor express himself, as it is now published. If he had, sir, I would have then noticed it. But I have to say to him that he has consented to the publication of a garbled account of that debate.

Mr. MEDILL inquired if his colleague was now through.

Mr. BOND said he was.

Mr. MEDILL said that his colleague had requested a distinct and categorical answer, and had received one. He would not be drawn into immaterial issues dependent on either the recollection of himself or his colleague after the lapse of a week. Although he had not suffered as much as others during the short time he had been on this floor, he was opposed to the practice that was obtaining of denouncing the reporters whenever we do not feel satisfied with the appearance of our own remarks. It is not expected that every word that is uttered in debate, should be set down and reported. It is enough that the substance is fairly and impartially given. My colleague is wholly mistaken, in supposing he did not attack the personal character and veracity of the editors of the Statesman. It was not until after he did so, that I rose. All must recollect the astonishment he affected, on finding any one who entertained the slightest confidence in their honor or veracity. My colleague is equally unfortunate in his recollection of the manner in which allusion was made to the county of Muskingum. So far from introducing it as an evidence of the correctness of the article in the Statesman, I admitted that I had seen the statement in relation to that county contradicted, and subsequently explained by the Statesman. Thus can my colleague fall into error, as well as the Reporters. In relation to the "account of that debate," I have nothing to do; and, in conclusion, will only add, that my own remarks, as reported, and shown to me by my colleague, contain the substance of what was said on the occasion. If not verbatim, as delivered, I desire to be considered as taking the responsibility off the Reporter, and, in the language of the courts, adopt them as they now stand, nunc pro tunc, so that my colleague may have an endorser without travelling beyond the bar.

Mr. BOND said. Then, sir, I again repeat, my colleague has consented to a garbled account of that debate, and I have nothing to retract.

Before Mr. BOND had taken his seat,

Mr. WELLER addressed the CHAIR, when

Mr. BOND observed that he had a word to say to him also. I did not hear this gentleman on Thursday last, when he was called to order by the CHAIR, and therefore asked that he might proceed. My colleague [Mr. WELLER] then added that he had said what he intended to say, and supposed I understood him. Whether he then said what the Globe now reports, I know not, for he was at a distance from me; but, if I had heard him, I would have told him, as I now do, that I can never misunderstand the yelping of a puppy.

Mr. WELLER remarked that he did not know that it was necessary for him to say any thing to his colleague over the way [Mr. BOND;] but as he had participated in the original debate which gave rise to this, he would detain the House a few moments. He then requested his colleague to repeat what he had said just before taking his seat, as he was anxious to understand him.

Mr. BOND said if he had understood his colleague [Mr. WELLER] as charging him with ungentlemanly conduct, as he was reported, he would have regarded it as the yelpings of a puppy.

Mr. WELLER then said he believed the report in the Globe was correct, although the language as reported was not perhaps as strong as he used. He said he did intend that his colleague [Mr. BOND] should understand him as charging that his conduct in dragging before this House a private citizen of Ohio, and applying to him the appellation of "lying Jake," was indecent, ungentlemanly, and unbecoming a member of this body.

Mr. W. was here called to order, and objections being made to his proceeding, Mr. BROWN of Mississippi moved that he be permitted to proceed, which was granted.

Mr. W. then said this was what he designed his colleague, [Mr. BOND] should understand in his remarks last week, when he charged him with indecent conduct. The language I then used, said Mr. W. was sufficiently plain to be understood by any man, and I cannot doubt my colleague so understood me, his assertion to the contrary notwithstanding.

It will be recollected, said Mr. W. by those who were present on that occasion, that my colleague [Mr. BOND] had risen in his place and declared that the statement in the Columbus paper in relation to the delegates appointed to the State convention was a tissue of lies from beginning to end. Soon after he took his seat, said Mr. W. I rose and stated that the list of the delegates appointed in the district which I had the honor to represent here was, I believed, correct. My colleague again took the the floor, and I then, said Mr. W. asked him distinctly whether he intended to impeach the correctness of my statement; and that, if he did, I had a word to say to him. Sir, said Mr. W. if he had done so I should have been compelled to bestow an epithet on him which he would have understood. I should have told him, said Mr. W. to his teeth, that he had uttered a base falsehood.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky called Mr. W. to order, and objected to his proceeding, and he was compelled to take his seat.

Mr. WELLER desired to say a few words more, but the House refused.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio also made an ineffectual attempt to obtain the floor, to make some remarks upon the subject in dispute.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY of Illinois in the chair, and took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the Government for the year 1840.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved to amend the bill, by striking out $70,000 for stationery, fuel, printing, etc. of the Senate, and inserting $50,000; and also to amend it, by striking out $150,000 for the same objects for the House of Representatives, and inserting $100,000; which amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WISE observed that it was his intention, before the CLERK began to read the bill, to make some general remarks on the subject of appropriations made by Congress; and these remarks he intended to apply to the accusations made of late by the Executive against the legislative department of the Government. It was not to be denied that the expenses of the Government of the United States had been enormously increased, fearfully increased to those who were for a simple Republican Government, pursuing a system of just economy. It was a solemn fact, to which all minds should be turned, that the expenses of the Government have, of late years, exceeded 33 or 34 millions. It was a fact, that if our revenue was collected by a capitation tax, it would exceed that of the last war with Great Britain. The average expenditures of General Jackson's administration were exceeding 18 millions of dollars, and exceeded those of Mr. Madison's administration by several hundred thousand dollars, while Mr. Van Buren had trod beyond the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, in the expenditure of money. A capitation tax to cover these expenditures, would be nearly two dollars a head. The excuse of the Executive now was that Congress had exceeded the estimates of the Departments; and that Congress had gone on expending the public money in an extravagant manner, contrary to the approbation of the Executive. Now this was the first appropriation bill presented to them, except that which was introduced in the early part of the session for the pay of the members of Congress, and he wished to have a distinct understanding with regard to the appropriations it contained. The per diem of members was fixed by law, and in passing that bill they could not go beyond the ordinary expenditure. It was known how many members there were, and the amount of mileage to which each was entitled; so that there could be no mistake with regard to that appropriation. But here was the first appropriation bill on which any question of responsibility could arise, and he took it at the first hop, giving notice to gentlemen who had arraigned the legislative department of the Government, in favor of the Executive, that he should call on them to vote for no money but such as the latter called for on his responsibility. The first inquiry that he would of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was: Did this bill, in the gross, and every item in it, and every part and parcel thereof—did it come from the Executive? Was it in pursuance of Executive recommendation? Was it beyond or below the Executive estimates; or in the third place, did it exceed or fall short in the amount appropriated by the bill of the last Congress?

Mr. JONES of Virginia, would with pleasure answer the interrogatories propounded by his colleague. The greater part of the items of appropriation in this bill were fixed and ascertained by law. All relating to what was called the civil list proper, perhaps every item, was inserted in virtue of existing laws, and therefore in exact conformity with the recommendations of the Executive Departments. Perhaps he should go further, and say that other items, in exact conformity with existing laws, were intended to be added to them in consequence of communications received from the Departments since the estimats were received.

In reference to the other inquiry of his colleague, whether the gross amount of the appropriations in this bill was larger than that in the same bill of the last Congress, he had to say that he had not compared every item in the one with every item in the other. He believed, however, it would turn out that the gross amount in this bill was larger than that in the bill of the last session, for the reason, as his colleague would perceive, that this being the long long session of Congress, and the other the short session, the amount for the pay of the members and the other expenses of the two Houses were now nearly double to what they then were.

It would also be perceived that there were several other items in this bill where the appropriations exceeded those asked for in the bill presented at the last Congress; he would name what was asked for, for the various purposes of the land offices, growing out of the fact that there was, at the last session, a considerable amount of money at that service remaining from previous appropriations. He would mention to his colleague that there were several other items not necessary for him now to mention, as he could explain them more to his satisfaction as they successively came up.

Mr. WISE said that he was not going to dispute these items now; he had not examined them enough to see whether there was any that he should dispute. But he wished to call the attention of his constituents to these facts, as he should continue to do for this session first, that the Executive was responsible for this bill; that it was in accordance with Executive recommendation, upon Executive reports, and with the Executive's reasons.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. All of them are not by Executive recommendation.

Mr. WISE. I understand that the committee has, in some instances, reduced the amounts recommended in the estimates. Is this the fact?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It is, sir.

Mr. WISE. Let all the facts be recollected as we go along, so that there may be no dispute hereafter. As his colleague remarked, (Mr. W. continued) there were some items, the most of them fixed and ascertained by law; as, for instance, the compensations of the President and heads of Departments, &c. &c. [naming them and their amounts;] and there were but few items, therefore, which varied from those of the year before. This bill was based upon the estimates of the long sessions bill, and yet there being so few items on which a variation of expenditure should be made, was it not astonishing that the gross amount should this year be larger. There was an increase of expenditure, though a general annunciation of economy was made in the President's opening message. The general ad captandum appeal on economy and reduction of expenditure which had been read by every body, was fresh in their minds; and yet, said he, when you place this Administration on its details, you will find out the last appropriation bill, as it has been with the others before it, is larger than the one of the year before. Unless some gentlemen of the Opposition should watch these expenditures, we shall, said Mr. W. be going on increasing and increasing our expenditures, and you and I, sir, will be arraigned before our constituents for it. He averred here now, what he had averred at home, that the Executive of this country is responsible for every dollar that has been appropriated for the last seven years. [Here follows a sentence or two, which was not heard by the Reporter.]

In the next place, the Administration had not, in their general reports and general messages, gone as far as they had afterwards gone every session of Congress, in their secret and particular recommendations to the committees. They had had, in the Committee of Naval Affairs, one estimate intended for the public eye, and another for the committee room. He did not charge that such was the fact now. This, he understood from his colleague, had been open and above board, and that the committee had cut down the larger estimates themselves. Again, he averred that not a solitary important appropriation, for seven years past, had been made by the two Houses of Congress which the Executive could not have arrested. Show me, said he, the solitary item of extravagant appropriation that the Executive has vetoed, except some internal improvement appropriations vetoed by Gen. Jackson. I shall, continued Mr. W. pursue this subject, calling the attention of the country to it, item by item, and show that we are exceeding the expenditures of the last year even while the President's message is calling out for economy. You may, said he, reduce fifteen millions, and then knock it down to the standard of the war expenses of James Madison's administration. Mr. W. in conclusion said he had accomplished his object, and he assured his colleague [Mr. JONES] that he would assist him in endeavoring to get his bill along as fast as possible.

Mr. CUSHING desired to add two or three remarks, in addition to what had been said by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] in all of which he entirely concurred. In order that there might not be any future question with regard to the appropriations in this bill, or any other, and that the Administration might not endeavor to shift the responsibility off its own shoulders, and throw it on Congress, he desired to make some addition to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, and, "in perpetuam rei memoriam," state what was his understanding of the subject. If what he should say was incorrect—if it involved any imputation on the Committee of Ways and Means—then they were to disavow any inferences which he might put upon this bill. This was a bill proposing an appropriation of millions—he did not know how many—and these millions were subdivided into a great number of items. It would be a serious task to pick out all these various items, and reconcile them with the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury; and in order that a gentleman might do it to his own satisfaction, he must have some little knowledge of the details of the business of the Treasury. In addition to this we have, said Mr. C. been told that the committee have varied from the estimates in various respects—in how many the chairman did not tell them. But it appeared that the committee reduced some of the items, and augmented others.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. No, sir, not augmented.

Mr. CUSHING, as to augmentation, asked if there were not amendments to be proposed containing new appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Virginia replied in the affirmative.

Mr. CUSHING. I ask if these new amendments appear in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Not in the estimates, but from additional information received by the committee from the Departments since the estimates were furnished. The amounts are not large, and I am ready to furnish the gentleman with all the information in regard to them. These estimates came in, as he before remarked, some time after the others had been received, and, therefore, were not printed with them. He wished to have them printed for the information of the House.

Mr. CUSHING continued. There were then additional estimates to be moved, and which the gentleman tendered for the purpose of having them printed. He desired that they might be printed so that they might be able to trace all the appropriations in this bill. It would give them additional means of comparison between the bill as it should pass, and the recommendations of the Executive. But there would be additional difficulty in going through all these items to ascertain whether Congress or the Executive should be responsible for them. He did not wish to encounter this labor. He held it to be unnecessary. He held that the Committee of Ways and Means were the representatives of the Treasury Department on that floor; and, therefore, all they proposed was to be considered as coming from that source. He held that the Committee of Ways and Means, a majority of them being of the party of the Administration, presented the views and wishes of the Administration, in whatever appropriation they asked for. He took this ground with a view of preventing any mistake or erroneous application hereafter of responsibility for appropriations founded on the recommendations of the Executive. He entirely agreed with the gentleman from Virginia, that they had a right to hold the Administration responsible for all the appropriations.

But there was another view of the subject, not in connection with party considerations. It might very naturally happen, in the present state of things, when, in the beginning of the session, the Executive come comes out with a preachment on economy, with exhortations against extravagance, that some necessities for expenditures should arise, after the estimates had been sent in. Now, whether it was right or not for the Executive to exhort Congress to be economical, when he had the right to make economy himself—when Congress had not the final control of the expenditures—when, owing to the relations between the party members of this House and the chief of the Administration, there would be some sympathy felt for his wishes—he would not pretend to say. But whether or not that was a matter of propriety on the part of the Executive, was not of much consideration. But he would say that the exigencies of the country, the public defences—objects of the highest utility, just and proper in all respects—might require expenditures, which it might be that the Executive had omitted to recommend, with a view of carrying out this ill considered economy, which he had urged in his opening message.

In this view of the subject, though he did not desire to go beyond the estimates, yet he would consider it the duty of Congress to make such appropriations, and he was prepared to vote for them. He held the Executive responsible for the condition of the country; and if he had neglected to recommend such appropriations as were necessary for the objects he had alluded to, he considered it a more momentous breach of duty, and more deserving of censure, than if he had been guilty of extravagance. He held that the Administration was placed in this alternative—that it must hang on one horn of the dilemma. Either it neglects to recommend necessary appropriations, to make party capital, or, treading under foot these professions of economy made in the message, disdaining this game of brag, of not who shall best govern the country, but who shall cheapest govern the country; and if such is to be the course of our administrators, we had better at once let the Government out to the lowest bidder. He would say no more on these professions of impracticable economy, for the mere purpose of gaining political capital. He held that the Administration which did it, did a worse act than subjecting itself to the charge of extravagance, for it must subject itself to one or the other of the two charges, and he would prefer that it should subject itself to the latter. If the Administration saw fit to neglect its duty for the purpose of throwing off responsibility, he, as a member of Congress, would not follow its example, and he felt bound to vote for those appropriations necessary for the defence of the country.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he apprehended that he and the gentleman from Massachusetts were not likely to disagree very much as to the course necessary to pursue in the investigations that were necessary in order to ascertain the principles on which both these important bills depended. Both of the gentlemen who had addressed the House, desired to secure strict accountability on the part of the Executive officers. Allow me to say, continued Mr. J. that I entertain the same views, and that, in order to accomplish them, the gentleman shall have my hearty co operation; and further, if gentlemen would only put their fingers on an item of appropriation that was like extravagance, he thought he should be able to satisfy them of the error into which they had fallen. This general mode of attack, by way of assailing every thing in the gross, and particularizing nothing, was one of those arguments which it was impossible to meet. It was like a shot thrown into a whole covey, where it would be impossible to see how any one point could be defended. He did not understand the gentleman as objecting to any one particular proposition, though he desired a strict accountability on the part of the Executive, and so did he. He knew of no professions of ad captandum economy that had been made by the Executive, and he saw no reason to doubt the sincerity of the recommendations in the message.

After some further remarks from Mr. WISE,

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky asked the chairman of the committee if there was any reduction in any of the items, except pensions and internal improvement.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said that the estimates for the Indian Department were vastly reduced below those of former sessions, because many of the occasions which required expenditures to be made, had ceased, and therefore, the aggregate would not be so large.

Mr. WHITE merely wished to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that, with the exception of the items he had mentioned, the aggregate of the appropriations in this bill exceeded that of the last year.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he was aware that wherever a reduction should fall, there would be no credit given for it, though the Administration was sure to be censured for an increase of expenditure, without any allowance being made for the necessity of it. Honorable gentlemen politically opposed to the Administration, used with advantage every item which had a tendency to run the aggregate of expenditures up; and when that item was reduced, they used it with the same effect to show that no credit was due for the aggregate being lower. For instance, when the pensions were larger than now, it was drawn into the general aggregate to swell the amount appropriated, and to charge extravagance upon the Administration. It was in vain for us to urge that this was an extra affair, a reward for the old soldiers of the Revolution, who were daily dropping off, and that it would gradually be discontinued. So, also, with regard to the appropriations for the Florida war, which were in like manner drawn into the general aggregate, and charged as extravagance upon the Administration. It was said here your Administration has expended five millions more than the last year; and it was in vain to answer that this money was expended for the purpose of protecting your women and children from the tomahawk and scalping knife of the Seminole. This little book (holding up the estimates) has been referred to again and again to show the extravagance of the Administration, while those who make the charge do not point out any particular item which comes within that designation. Now (said Mr. J.) all I want is to hold gentlemen up to their own figures and arguments. If they charge extravagance when particular items of expenditure are large, let them give credit when those items are reduced—let them cancel the debit by entering the credit. But his colleague said that it had been the practice to present one estimate for the public eye and another for the committee rooms. To this he could only answer that, if there had been such practice, it never was within his knowledge.

Mr. WISE hoped that his colleague did not intend to misrepresent him. What he said was, that we have general estimates and general reports which are printed and published, and that then, during the sessions of the committees, we had other estimates coming in, which are not published and printed. Now his colleague admitted that the committee had had some such this winter, and that they had not been printed.

Mr. JONES said he understood his colleague, at first, to say there was one estimate intended for the public eye, and another secret one for the committees. He now understood him to say that additional estimates were sent in after the general list at the commencement of the session.

Mr. WISE said he would state a fact, on his own responsibility; and that was that he had known a high officer of the Government, in the time when we apprehended a French war, to make a verbal call for a larger appropriation than he dare call for in writing.

Mr. JONES of Virginia did not believe that the remarks of his colleague was calculated to be prejudicial to the Administration. The warm manner of his colleague was calculated to make an impression that there was something wrong, and they would have had that effect, if it had not been for the explanation he had afterwards given; for he admitted in it that it would be necessary for the Departments to send in additional estimates, after the commencement of the session. There was no man who had any knowledge of the business of the Departments, but must be aware that this could not be avoided. An injury done to one of the fortifications, after the meeting of Congress, and after the estimates have been sent in, makes it necessary for the Secretary of War to come forward, and ask for an additional appropriation to repair that injury. This was a sample of the communications which his colleague spoke of as secret, and not intended for the public eye. Sir, (said Mr. J.) I have nothing to conceal from the public eye. He desired that every thing should be laid open, and such was the desire of the Executive. The honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts spoke of it as something very remarkable, that this important bill was not accompanied by reports explaining every item. Now when it was known to the gentleman that this committee was allowed but thirty days from the commencement of the session to report every one of the appropriation bills in; and when he bore in mind, that owing to the length of time that elapsed before the committees were appointed, that at this session they had but twenty days to perform that duty in, he would admit that they had more than should be imposed on them within that limited space. But why call on the committee to explain every item in this bill? Had not the gentleman every particle of information which the members of the committee had? Could he point to a single avenue of information which was not as accessible to him as to the committee. If he would take up the documents of the House for this and the last session, he would have all the information that was necessary to enable him to arrive at a correct result. Unless the gentleman designed that others should perform this work for him, he would not call on the members of the committee for it. Mr. J. knew the gentleman's ability and great industry, and that he was every day capable of obtaining all the information he desired. Mr. J. did not desire to detain the committee, and therefore would say nothing further until some gentleman rendered it necessary for him to do so.

Mr. BELL adverted to the past practice in relation to the estimates; and called the attention of the chairman of Ways and Means to a certain document, officially reported to the House at a previous session, in which was contrasted the amount called for in those estimates, with the amount actually appropriated by Congress, with a view to show that the responsibility of the excess above the estimates was attempted to be thrown upon Congress, by practising a kind of fraud upon the people in relation thereto. He contended that the charge that Congress was responsible was not well founded, but that the odium, if any, attached to the Executive. The Executive had been in the habit of sending in estimates, which went forth to the country in the annual documents, and were extensively circulated; but subsequently application would be secretly made to the Committee of Ways and Means to place in the appropriation bills items omitted from the estimates, whether by design or not he was not prepared to say, but it looked very much like it from the facts of the case—items which when aggregated would swell the appropriations to millions beyond the estimates. In proof that the Executive had two sets of estimates, he asserted that in some instances they were reported to Congress, and from which were omitted even the sums necessary to carry on the Florida war, and to fulfil Indian treaties; objects for which the proper departments knew appropriations were absolutely and indispensably necessary. The same course had been pursued this session, to a certain extent. A treaty, which had just been ratified by the Senate, and which the Executive, when he sent in the estimates, must have been aware would, in all probability, be ratified, would need some three or four hundred thousand dollars to fulfil. This would necessarily swell the aggregate of appropriations. Yet no mention was made of the probability of this amount being needed, and would be hereafter charged upon Congress. Mr. B. before concluding his remarks, adverted to the Indian wars, (which had contributed to swell the appropriations,) and contended that they grew out of the bad management of the Executive, or the agents of the Government under his control.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, observed that it must be perfectly apparent to every member of the committee, that in the remarks he submitted a few moments ago, he intended to apply them to what had transpired at the present session of Congress, and did not intend to go beyond it. He knew very well, that he would have enough on his hands, without going beyond the range of his duty, and referring to the transactions of the Administration, for the last four or five years—to the documents of which, the gentleman wished him to go back to. Now if there had been any fraud practised, he was very sure that they would not have escaped the observation of the honorable gentleman; and that he would not have been backward in making the public acquainted with them. All he had now to say, was, that he had seen nothing on the part of the Executive, which showed a desire to conceal any thing from the Legislature, or from the people. But the honorable gentleman had gone back to show that the President was censurable for the manner in which he carried on the Florida war. We all know, said Mr. J., how easy it is to find fault, and the gentlemen can prove, in their speeches and on paper, that every thing in this war has been conducted wrong, and that the President is little better than a fool, while our ablest generals know nothing about military affairs. Let such arguments go forth to the country for what they are worth, and the people will know how to put the right construction upon them.

Mr. BIDDLE did not feel inclined, and perhaps was not physically able at this moment to follow the somewhat erratic course of this debate. He merely rose to say a word as to the degree of weight that should be attached to these bills, from having been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. In most cases the items were found in the estimates from the Departments, which had been embodied in the report of the Secretary of Treasury, and were referred to in the boast of the President's message about the saving of five millions as compared with last year. Other items had been presented from the Deparsments which were not in those estimates. Mr. B. had taken a stand at the outset, that he would resist the introduction of such items, unless an explanation was given why they had been dropped in the estimates laid before the President. The committee had declined to go the length of this principle, but had, he believed, generally required the sanction of a department, and repudiated that of surbordinates, who had been, in the first instance, put forward. The result would be, that for the supplemental items thus introduced, there was no tangible enduring responsibility; the application from the Departments were fugitive, and would be forgotten; and the expenditure, even for an additional clerk, as it appeared in the statute book, would seem the act of this body, in defiance of the President's anxious injunctions. Mr. B. said the honorable chairman [Mr. JONES] knew, and would, of course, in the progress of the bills, point out such items. They want to be watched with jealousy. He believed that items of magnitude of this description, would come rather from other committees than that of Ways and Means, which he was bound to say, had been vigilant and scrupulous. Mr. B. would not be understood as saying that he would vote for nothing but what was in the President's estimates. Far from it. But with regard to matters pressed slyly by the Department, after a general statement had been got up for the public eye, he would hold them to a rigid explanation.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked: Mr. CHAIRMAN, I am a new member, and shall not go over the ground so much debated here to-day, as to who has been most to blame for extravagance in expending public money during former sessions of Congress; whether it be the present and former President, or Congress.

I shall endeavor to confine myself to the question now under debate; and upon this subject I have to state, that so far as I can judge, from what I have witnessed, the most talented opponents of the Administration have not treated the President fairly on this question of expenditure of public money. In my opinion, an opposition to an Administration, on the ground of extravagance, should be able to point out what items of appropriations for the public service are too high. If there be such, I call upon the talented gentlemen now denouncing the President in general terms for wasting public money, to point out the item that is too high, and I will go with them. They will always find me among those who vote the least sum which will carry on the Government. If they cannot point out some particular item, it does seem to me that it is unfair to make general objections against the President, and by that means make the people dissatisfied with the administration of the Government of their choice, by so much clamor against bills that gentlemen, after all of their complaining, themselves vote for. Do they expect they can excuse themselves to their constituents after voting for such appropriations, by endeavoring to shift the blame from themselves to the President? They cannot do it, sir. The people will require voting against as well as speaking against appropriations, of which complaint is made to them.

I have, Mr. Chairman, witnessed, on the part of the most talented gentlemen of the Opposition in this House, a method of attacking the President, which seems to me very unusual and unstatesmanlike. It is this: whilst complaining of the President for his extravagance, and making the greatest professions of economy themselves, yet wherever the President has failed to make a call upon us for money for any object of expense to which our money has heretofore been applied, these gentlemen have attacked him in the most violent manner for not including that particular object in his estimates for the year.

Gentlemen know, or ought to know, that whenever the Government begins to withhold public money from interests or sections of country accustomed to receive it, that the very act of withholding money from that section or interest must necessarily, of itself, irritate and displease the people so disappointed.

Now it does seem to me that if these reductions in the estimates are proper, a statesman or patriot would rather desire so sooth and quiet the people so disappointed, by making them acquainted with the true condition of the whole country, and the impoverished situation of the Treasury. But if these reductions are not proper, then it appears to me that, as statesmen and patriots, they should show that the country required an enlarged expenditure, and support it with their votes. But it does appear to me that this method of denouncing the President for expenditures for which we vote ourselves; or denouncing him for not calling upon us for money which we ourselves are not willing to raise by our votes, is more like a mere partisan warfare than patriotic statesmanlike opposition.

These, sir, are my views upon the question of expenditures. I know that I am, under the Constitution, responsible to my constituents for the money I vote away; and I will not attempt to shift that responsibility upon the President; nor can any member here excuse himself for voting away the public money on the ground that the President is extravagant. He can use or expend no public money, unless we here vote it for him, and require him to use it; and I now tell gentlemen of all parties who themselves are disposed to cut down this appropriation bill, that they will find me with them upon every attempt to lop off needless expenditures.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he was glad to hear such professions of economy from the other side of the House. He assured gentlemen that he would co-operate with them in the great work of economy, about which they now seemed so solicitous. If the result shall prove a little practice, as well as profession, on their part, he (Mr. V.) would undertake to prophesy, that the revenues of the year would still be equal to its expenditures; particularly if we should pass a declaratory law, according to the proposition of the Committee on Manufactures, to guard against the frauds and evasions in your revenue laws, which were so constantly occurring. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] had, a few days ago, told us that the Secretary of the Treasury had given us too flattering a view of the finances; that there was a permanent deficit; that in asking for the power to issue Treasury notes, he asked for nothing but palliatives; and that the Secretary was deceived, if he entertained the idea that, with the aid of five millions of Treasury notes, he would be able to get through the year. Notwithstanding the confident assertions of the gentleman, he (Mr. V.) entertained a confident hope that the Secretary would be able to get through the year without further aid, if you promptly passed the above declaratory law, and took care, in your appropriations, not to exceed the estimates. He had heard some strange doctrines to-day; doctrines that seemed to him (Mr. V.) to conflict directly with sentiments which their authors had so often reiterated here. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] says he holds the Executive responsible for every appropriation made by Congress within the last seven years. How did the gentleman expect the Executive to arrest the legislation of Congress in regard to appropriations? Was it by means of the veto power?

[Mr. WISE responded: "No, not by the veto."]

Then, said Mr. VANDERPOEL, I wish the gentleman would define the means which he expects the President to use to prevent improper legislation by us?

[Mr. WISE said it was a certain indefinable power, which no one understood better than his friend from New York. It was a look, or a hint, or a shake of the head, by the President. This was all that was necessary to deter his faithful supporters in this House from voting for any measure.]

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he was astonished to hear such a doctrine as this from the gentleman from Virginia. For more than six years has that gentleman, and the "indefinable" party with which he has acted, most indignantly declaimed against the alarming increase of Executive power; this has been the burden of his never ending complaints; and now, forsooth, he holds the President blameworthy, because he will not transcend his own constitutional functions, and dictate directly to members of Congress, in regard to matters that come clearly within their constitutional province. Was it not very strange that the gentleman should, so suddenly, change his tune? For years has Executive encroachment, real or imaginary, been with that gentleman the alarming political sin of the times; and now, behold, it suits his purpose to attach blame to the President, because he has not practically encroached far enough on the jurisdiction of Congress. He, Mr. V. was not prepared to hear such a doctrine—such a ground of blame against the President from that quarter. He could now, however, he hoped, congratulate the country that the frightful bugbear of Executive influence had at least disappeared; for the leader of the Opposition had told the House that the President was culpable, because he had not more efficiently exerted that influence.

Mr. V. said he was not a little surprised at the positions assumed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] He tells us that he would hold the President responsible, not only for all appropriations made by Congress, but he would also hold him responsible for the omission of Congress to make necessary appropriations, if they were not included in the estimates. The President, then, is to be blamed if Congress appropriate too much; and the President is to be equally blamed, if Congress appropriate too little. It seems that there is no possible way of shielding the President from censure, unless Congress adopt the very exact medium which accords with justice and propriety. This is certainly placing the President in a pretty difficult position. Such doctrines at this late day seemed to him, Mr. V. to militate very much against all the arguments and denunciations he had, for the last several years, heard against undue Executive influence. It was a little singular that the gentleman from Massachusetts should venture to hold the President so strictly responsible for all the appropriations made by Congress, when we considered what that gentleman had done here within the last four days. That gentleman had recently, as a member of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, reported a bill to appropriate five millions of dollars to indemnify a class of claimants for spoliations committed by France anterior to 1800. Now if it should so happen that his bill should become a law, some four or five years hence, when gentlemen of the Opposition shall hold up in frightful colors the appalling aggregate of the expenditures of this Government, they will take good care not to admit or state that, with this large item of five millions, the Executive had no connection; and yet, according to the arguments of the two gentlemen who had preceded him, the President ought to be held responsible for such appropriations. And it was of this that he, Mr. V. complained. When gentlemen talked about, or denounced, the expenditures of a particular year, they contented themselves with the aggregate: never troubled themselves with particulars, for if they did so, they would show that their own votes were instrumental in swelling up these aggregates. We do charge, sir, that the large expenditures of late years are mainly attributable to Congress, and not to the President. This very year, a proposition has come from one or two of my colleagues, [Messrs. MARVIN and BERNARD,] to appropriate a very formidable sum for the improvements of rivers and harbors; appropriations for objects of this description were not included in the estimates sent here by the Departments. Still, if his colleague's bill should pass, it would serve to create a new text for homilies some two or three years hence, upon the extravagance of this Administration.

Some five years ago, we passed a bill to increase the compensation of the officers of the navy; for which he (Mr. V.) voted; but the most formidable opposition it encountered, was from the friends of the Administration here. This had swelled the naval expenditures very considerably; yet gentlemen, when they denounced any increase, would not tell us that they voted for a measure, which essentially contributed to such increase. Confine yourselves, then, to the estimates; and, my word for it, you will not have so much occasion in future times to complain of the extravagance of 1840.

After some remarks from Mr. GRAVES,
On motion of Mr. DUNCAN,
The committee rose, and
The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, April 10, 1840.

Mr. W. said he would take this opportunity to state that he was in favor of the passage of a general bankrupt law, if corporations, and especially banks—which are now setting up as a kind of submonarchies in the land—were embraced in its provisions.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FRONTIER DEFENCES.

Mr. NORVELL presented a preamble and joint resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, concerning the military protection of the frontier of that State. While up, he would take the occasion to express his profound surprise at the opinion expressed by General Scott, in the communication lately made by him to the War Department, in relation to the British military preparations on the northern frontier—that he regarded all forts and barracks built on that frontier as of little or no military value to either of the parties, in the event of a new war between the United States and Great Britain. He declares that from Cornwall, which is on the St. Lawrence, along the whole frontier line of Upper Canada, extending, as it does, several hundred miles all the way up to Lake Superior, such structures are of no military value. Uninformed as he was in military science, he must nevertheless say that the "fixed opinion" of the gallant General was at war with all the notions which he had derived from history or observation upon such subjects. He had been in the habit of regarding the military attainments, courage, and skill of that distinguished officer, with great respect; but it was certain that his views did not correspond with the opinions of the people along the whole line of northern frontier. They did think military works of great importance, both to accomodate the troops, and to defend the country. They could not see how such works could be dispensed with one side, when they had been constructed, and were in a course of construction, on the other side. He did not believe with the General, that the British military preparations at any point were made, and making, solely to protect the neighborhood "from refugee incendiaries from our side." With the views which he entertained upon this subject, he must be permitted to ask the special attention of the Military Committee to the works already existing, as well as to those required for our defence, on that frontier. And he would move the reference of the resolutions, together with a letter from the Governor of Michigan, to that committee, and further that they should be printed for the use of the Senate.

The reference and printing were ordered.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Berrien county, Michigan, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of the Lake Superior Fishing and Mining Company of the State of Michigan, praying to be allowed the right of working the mineral lands belonging to the United States along the southern shore of Lake Superior, in the said State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the following preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, which were read:

A PREAMBLE AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS IN RELATION TO THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Whereas, The General Assembly of the State of Ohio have adopted and caused to be laid before this General Assembly the following resolutions, to wit: "Whereas, by the Declaration of Independence on the fourth of July, seventeen hundred and seventy-six, the United States of America became a sovereign and independent nation, with full power over the territory within her limits; and whereas, at the treaty of seventeen hundred and eighty-three, between the United States of America and Great Britain, the Northern and Northeastern boundaries between the two Governments were fairly designated and distinctly described; and whereas the said British Government has since set up claims to a part of the territory of these States, and now lying within the State of Maine; and whereas the subjects of the British Crown have recently invaded and trespassed upon the territory of the State of Maine, and within the limits of this Confederacy; and destroyed the property belonging to the State: Therefore, Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we view with united approbation the prompt and energetic action of the authorities of Maine, to protect the rights and honor not only of their own State, but of the whole Union: Resolved, That the act of Congress conferring upon the President of the United States ample power and means to protect this nation from foreign invasion, has our full and most hearty assent: Resolved, That while we highly approve the efforts made by the President of the United States, to avert from this country the calamities of war, and earnestly hope that they may be, as they have been heretofore, successful; yet, should a collision take place between this Government and Great Britain, in the settlement of the pending dispute, Ohio tenders her whole means and resources to the authorities of this Union, in sustaining our rights and honor: Resolved, That the Governor be directed to transmit a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the President of the United States, and to the Governors of the several States," March 18, 1839;

THEREFORE, Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That we fully concur in and heartily approve of the above resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That while we cherish the hope that, in the adjustment of the question of our national boundary, the integrity of our soil, and the national honor, may be preserved inviolate without an appeal to arms, yet we will ever prefer honorable war rather than dishonorable peace.

Resolved, That, should a collision take place between this Government and Great Britain in the settlement of the pending dispute, Indiana tenders her whole means and resources to the authorities of the Union in sustaining our rights and honor.

Resolved, That the Governor be directed to transmit a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the President of the United States, to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the Governors of the several States.

The resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Joseph Philipson, of Missouri, praying the confirmation of his title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the following resolutions passed by the Legislature of Maine, which were read:

RESOLVES RELATING TO THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Resolved, That the patriotic enthusiasm with which several of our sister States, the past year, tendered us with their aid to repel a threatened foreign invasion, demands our grateful recollection; and, whilst this spirit of self sacrifice and self devotion to the national honor pervades the Union, we cannot doubt that the integrity of our territory will be preserved.

Resolved, That the promptness and unanimity with which the last Congress, at the call of this State, placed at the disposal of the President the arms and treasures of the nation, for our defence; the firmness of the Executive, in sustaining the action of this State, and repelling the charge of an infraction of the arrangement made with the British Lieutenant Governor in March last, and charging back upon the British Government the violation of that agreement; their decision, in demanding the removal of the British troops now quartered upon the disputed territory, as the only guarantee that they sincerely desire an amicable adjustment of the boundary question; afford us confident assurance that this State will not be compelled single handed to take up arms in defence of our territory and the national honor, and that the crisis is near when this question will be settled by the National Government, either by negotiation or by the ultimate resort.

Resolved, That, unless the British Government, during the present session of Congress, make or accept a distinct and satisfactory proposition for the immediate adjustment of the boundary question, it will be the duty of the General Government to take military possession of the disputed territory; and, in the name of a sovereign State, we call upon the National Government to fulfil its constitutional obligations to establish the line which they have solemnly declared to be the true boundary, boundary, and to protect this State in extending her jurisdiction to the utmost limits of our territory.

Resolved, That we have a right to expect the General Government will extend to this member of the Union, by negotiation or by arms, the protection of her territorial rights, guarantied by the Federal compact, and thus save her from the necessity of falling back upon her natural and reserved rights of self defence and self protection—rights which constitutions can neither give nor take away; but, should this confidence of a speedy crisis be disappointed, it will become the imperative duty of Maine to assume the defence of our State and national honor, and expel from our limits the British troops now quartered upon our territory.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward copies of these resolutions to the President and Heads of Departments, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, with a request to the latter to lay them before the respective bodies of which they are members; also, to the Governors of the several States, with a request to lay them before their several Legislatures.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Maine in opposition to the bill reducing the duty on salt, and repealing the fishing bounties, &c. which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Maumee, in the State of Ohio, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRUNDY submitted an additional document in relation to the petition of Preston Starrit; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BENTON, from the Select Committee, which was raised to make a legal and documentary report on the origin and character of the fishing bounties and allowances, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the minority of the same committee, made a report upon the same subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON moved that ten thousand additional copies of these reports be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. RUGGLES objected to this motion. He hoped that the usual number would be printed, and then if it was deemed to contain matter interesting to the public, a motion could be made to print a larger number.

Mr. HUBBARD was glad that the Senator from Tennessee had made the motion for the printing of an extra number of these reports. The subject of which they treated was one of great interest to a large portion of New England, and he wished that all that could be said on both sides might be generally read. He would therefore vote for the motion.

Mr. ANDERSON said he had one or two reasons for his motion, with which he would not have troubled the Senate, but for the objections which had been urged against it.

The subject was one of the greatest interest, and, as to one branch of it, had already attracted the deepest attention of the public. Inquiry had been awakened in almost every portion of the country, and the most lively expectation was felt, particularly in the interior and the Far West—and coming, as he did, from a State that had an earnest solicitude upon the subject of the salt tax, and being a member of the committee that made the report, he thought it his duty, and due to the importance of the questions involved, to move for the printing of an extra number of copies, with a view to give to the people all the information within our power. The two reports now submitted to the Senate contained the adverse opinions which had long prevailed in the country, fully expressed, and presented a full and complete documentary and legal review, arranged with accuracy, and embracing the statutory provisions from the origin of the subject, through its whole progress, to the present period. These statutes had been examined and compared, from 1789 onward, and the whole evidence growing out of petitions and reports, which had been presented to Congress by those who entertained conflicting opinions, were put into a condensed form, with lucid comments, which shed ample light upon the questions, and he had no doubt would be highly gratifying and greatly useful to the public. He trusted that the printing would be ordered: he thought it due to the importance of the subject and to the people.

The question was then taken, on printing the extra number, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to amend an act, approved January 18, 1839, entitled an act to amend an act entitled an act to require the judge of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State, approved June 18, 1838, and for other purposes; which was read, and ordered to second reading.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill for the relief of James L. Cochran, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committe on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to annex a certain tract of land to the Coosa land district, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill for the relief of Sutton Stephens, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whic was referred the bills from the House

For the relief of James Alexander;

For the relief of James Brewer;

For the relief of the representatives of William Williams, sen.;

A bill granting two townships of land to the Territory of Iowa, for the purposes of a university;

A bill granting a section of land for schools in St. Clair county, Ill.;

A bill to allow further time to Centre College, Ky. to sell certain lands; and

A bill to amend an act entitled an act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants, and perfect titles, to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same, passed the 18th of April, 1806; reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred House bill granting the right of pre-emption to certain lots in the town of Perrysburg, in the State of Ohio, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the following bills from the House:

An act for the relief of Josias Thompson, superintendent of the Cumberland Road between Brownsville and Wheeling;

An act for the relief of Benjamin C. Roberts; reported them severally without amendment, and that they ought not to pass.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill for the relief of Garret Vliet, reported it without amendment, with a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the House bill for the relief of W. Bailey, survivor of Bailey and Delord, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of John T. Addoms, reported the same with an amendment, and a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the settlement of the claims of New Hampshire against the United States, reported the same without amendment.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ALLEN asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to expose to sale all the public lands in the State of Ohio, hitherto reserved from sale; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back to the Senate the memorial from certain officers of the engineer corps, remonstrating against the passage of the bill for the equalization of the pay and allowances of the officers of the line and staff of the army, and moved that it be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. P. also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was recommitted the bill authorizing the President to raise 1500 men to serve in the Florida war, reported the same with an amendment, (to strike out "marine corps" wherever it occurred in the bill;) which was agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants of land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the twenty-sixth day of May, eighteen hundred and twenty-four, and an act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said acts to claimants to land within the State of Louisiana and Mississippi, being taken up as in Committee of the Whole, was discussed at length by Messrs. GRUNDY, BENTON, HENDERSON, LINN, and CLAY of Kentucky, when, on motion by Mr. BENTON, it was postponed until Monday next.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, April 10th, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the resolution reported from the Committee on Public Expenditures by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS;] and it was read as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the duties originally assigned to the Committee of Public Expenditures, by the rules of the House, having since been transferred to other committees, and the said Committee of Public Expenditures having no duties to perform, that the rule for its appointment be abolished.

Mr. CUSHING argued at some length in opposition to the resolution. He adverted to the political character of the committees at previous sessions of Congress; the peculiar construction of which had rendered them powerless. The SPEAKER of the two last Congresses' had been elected on party grounds; and the committees had been organized to the same end. But now the case was different—the present SPEAKER, when he was installed into office, in his remarks made upon that occasion, said that the committees to investigate the various departments of the Government should be appointed without regard to personal or party considerations; and in the appointment of these committees, Mr. C. was of opinion that the SPEAKER had removed the objections of party organization. He has entirely removed that difficulty, and has appointed gentlemen conspicuous for their talent, and who are industrious and well acquainted with the manner of pursuing investigations. A majority on the committees are decided opponents of the Administration; and there was the power to investigate ad libitum. Now, when we have this power, it is proposed to abolish the committee. Because there had been neglect heretofore, or that the committee had been rendered powerless by its peculiar organization, was no argument that this committee should now be abolished. As the committee on the Departments are now organized, there was the power to investigate; and the investigation could be made effective. He contended that the general powers of this committee had not been transferred or annulled, and went into an argument to prove that fact. The committees, as he before said, consisted of gentlemen who had the habit and taste, and could make efficient investigation, and denied that they could be excused before the country, unless their powers had been abridged by transfer to other committees. He denied that there was any transfer of the general powers of this committee by the appointment of special committees. He argued to show that if the principle should be once settled, on the ground claimed, as good cause for the abrogation of this committee, all the standing committees would be for shifting the responsibility of investigation.

He denied not only the premises of the resolution, but the conclusion to be drawn from these premises, even if true; and denied, therefore, the entire proposition contained in it, and was opposed to its adoption. If the committee was to be abolished at all, he thought it ought to be done under a general revision of the rules of the House at the commencement of the session, and not at a time when there were objects requiring its investigation, and when the country needed the light which it would be in the power of that committee to bestow.

Mr. BOND, as a member of the Committee on Public Expenditures, wished that the proposition contained in the resolution might be decided upon at once—instanter; for he desired either to be relieved from his obligations as a member of the committee, or else to go on with the matters of which it had cognizance.

Mr. BRIGGS replied at some length to Mr. CUSHING, and went into a statement of the history, powers, and duties of the committee. The committee, he said, had come to the conclusion, after a full examination of the rule under which it was appointed, taken in connection with the other rules of the House, that they had no duties to perform—that their appointment was a mere matter of formality; and, being so, they wished, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOND] had stated, to have the matter decided at once. They had wished it to have been decided long ago, and it was not their fault that it had not been. They had, as soon as possible after their appointment, and as soon as they could find a place in which to meet, instructed him to report the resolution now before the House. Mr. B. went into some amusing statements to show the perfect oblivion to which every thing connected with this committee, save its name alone, had been consigned.

Mr. WISE obtained the floor, to make some remarks on the above question; but the morning hour having expired, he yielded to Mr. JONES of Virginia, who called for the special orders of the day.

Mr. BELL, by general consent, submitted a motion that the Committee on Indian Affairs have leave to send for persons and papers in the matters referred to them as to the execution of the treaty with the Winnebago Indians; which motion was unanimously agreed to.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY of Illinois in the chair,) on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840.

Mr. DUNCAN, who was entitled to the floor on the above bill, went into a review, at great length, of the causes which had contributed to swell the appropriations beyond the estimates of the Departments. He contended that not much more than one half of the appropriations passed by the recommendation or approbation of the President; and he asked those who had denounced him so much, whether he was to be held responsible. Mr. D. also referred to the past history of the proceedings of Congress in relation to the Cumberland road. In relation to that road, he believed a majority of the Democratic party had opposed it on the general ground that they were opposed to internal improvements not expressly authorized by the Constitution, or demanded for the purposes of carrying out the principles on which the Federal Government was formed. The Federal party had generally sustained appropriations to that road on the ground that they have been, and now are, in favor of internal improvements of every character, and however extravagant. More than the usual number of the Democratic party had this year voted for the Cumberland road, whilst a less number of the Whigs have voted in favor of that road. He asserted that the appropriations this session for that road have been defeated by the Whigs, and the journals would sustain him in that assertion.

He then adverted to the abuse which was daily heaped on the Administration party. It had been denounced as profligate; that cry had been rung upon every change, from the first day that he had entered the hall: and yet those declaiming could not point out in what particular. If gentlemen believed that profligacy and extravagance had existed to such an extent, it was their duty to point it out; and he would go as far as any of them to correct it. If they believed that there were too many officers, and their salaries were too large, they were required by their oaths to point them out, and move to reduce them. Why not, in accordance with their belief, bring forward their measure of reform. He would, and he was confident the Democratic party would, do what was right and proper. We now hear much noise about the public printing—it costs too much, &c. If it costs too much now, it must have cost too much at the last session, because the prices were the same; and the cost of printing ordered at the last short session was four times as great as it will be at this session, of more than double the length. Why did not these honorable Whigs reform it, and reduce the prices at the last session of Congress. They had then a decided majority. They had the remedy in their own hands and could have applied it, but they would not. The Democratic party would then have gone with them, heart and hand, in making this now wished for reform. No, it would not suit their party purposes then. They elected a man to do the printing; and permitted him to transfer and barter it away to another—both receiving large profits according to their own showing. They permitted the public to be fleeced and robbed of some $20,000. Why, he again asked, did they not come forward with their corrective? Why, their political friends had it then. So soon as the Democratic party obtained the power, they took this reform in hand. They went about it, and appointed a committee; and if he recollected right, this committee had reported a reported a reduction of fifteen per cent.; which, if the report is well grounded, proves that the Federal printers of the last session had received some fifteen thousand dollars on every hundred too much; and yet we heard nothing said by these declaiming Whigs then about the prices of printing being too high, or that too much was ordered; nor do we hear any wish expressed that the excess paid them should be refunded, as the same party now propose to do towards the Democratic printer. This was perfectly understood by the country. Mr. D. then commented on the continued cry about the office holders. The whole ground of the opposition by the Whig party to the Administration, growing out of a desire to turn them out, to put in the many lean, lank, hungry expectants for four years, which would be as long as could possibly be expected, under any circumstances, that such a party could maintain power. Mr. D. then referred to the Presidential questions, which periodically deranged the affairs of the country. By reference to the public journals of the nation, it would be seen that this cry of ruin, ruin, and panic, was enacted the year previous to such election; and that it was the effect of a species of political monomania. The cry of ruin, extravagance, was perfectly understood by the people.

Mr. D. then went into a full examination of the political and military character of General Harrison, and commented with much force on the efforts the Whig party were making to draw the attention of the people from the odiousness of the principles of their candidate for the Presidency, by palming him off as the "log cabin and hard cider candidate." He showed conclusively that he neither drank "hard cider nor lived in a log cabin;" but that he lived on a princely estate, and enjoyed the emoluments of an office which netted him more than five thousand dollars annually. He also proved from the records of proceedings in the Ohio Legislature, and speeches on that occasion, that General Harrison, instead of being the poor man's friend, was in favor of selling them into slavery—even to become the slaves of free negroes, if they should think proper to purchase them. Mr. D's remarks will be published in full hereafter.

Mr. GIDDINGS obtained the floor; and, on his motion, the committee rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again; which was granted.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, enclosing a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, giving information in relation to the assemblage of Indians on the Northeastern frontier, and the countenance the British had given them; made in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 9th ultimo. On motion of Mr. CUSHING, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department in compliance with a resolution of the 23d ultimo, giving a statement of all the sums of money which have been invested in State stocks. On motion of Mr. ADAMS, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the House sundry depositions in relation to the New Jersey contested elections; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, April 11, 1840.

The business before the House during the morning hour, was the resolution submitted by Mr. BRIGGS, chairman of the Committee on Public Expenditures, providing that, as the duties originally assigned to that committee have been transferred to other committees, leaving the said committee no duties to perform, it therefore be abolished.

Mr. WISE addressed the House with much earnestness in opposition to the resolution, in a speech in which he animadverted with great severity on the neglect to investigate the abuses which he said were great and numerous in the Departments, and on the reasons which had been urged in support of the resolution. The morning hour expired before Mr. W. had concluded his remarks; but, by consent of the House, he was permitted to finish.

A number of Senate bills on the Speaker's table were taken up, read, and referred; after which, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY of Illinois in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

After some discussion on a question of order,

Mr. GIDDINGS of Ohio moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and thereupon proceeded to address the committee at considerable length in a speech, in which he adverted to many items of expenditure in the Departments, on which he commented as extravagant, and in contrast with the economical professions of the Administration; and, in the close, took occasion to reply to several charges which had been advanced against the character of General Harrison.

Mr. DROMGOOLE insisted on the rule prescribing that a bill in committee shall be debated in order of its sections, and contended that the motion to strike out the enacting clause was not in order.

The CHAIR overruled the objection; whereupon

Mr. DROMGOOLE took an appeal, but subsequently withdrew it.

The question was then put on Mr. GIDDINGS's motion, and it was negatived, without a count.

The first item of the bill having been read,

Mr. WISE went at large into a speech, in which he compared the amount to be appropriated to the civil list by this bill with the amount of similar appropriations in former years, especially with those of the administration of Mr. Adams, which had been so much reprobated by its opponents.

Mr. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, addressed the committee in reply, vindicating the bill, and challenging Mr. W. to a detailed examination of its items.

Mr. WISE rose in rejoinder, and having accepted the challenge, and produced a portfolio of papers as preparatory to his speech, Loud cries were made to rise, and Mr. W. yielding, moved for the rising of the committee.

The committee then rose, and the House adjourned—Mr. WISE holding the floor for Monday.

BENTON, GRUNDY, CLAY of Kentucky, SEVIER, LINN, HENDERSON, ANDERSON, CALHOUN, CLAY of Alabama, and BUCHANAN, the question coming up on the following amendment proposed by Mr. BENTON, viz:

"And be it further enacted, That this act shall not apply to any claim in the State of Missouri for more than twenty thousand arpens, or to any claim exceeding that amount, which lies partly in that State, and partly in Arkansas."

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House further testimony in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

The presentation of petitions being the first thing in order, the roll by States was called over for that purpose; when they were presented.

By Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS, of New Hampshire.

[Mr. WILLIAMS presented petitions to protect the revenue from fraud; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee of the Whole, having the subject under consideration. Also the petition of Mr. Snow and others for rescinding the rule in relation to Abolition petitions; which was not received under the rule.]

By Messrs. ADAMS, CUSHING, and LINCOLN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. ADAMS presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, concerning certain laws of other States, which affect the rights of the citizens of Massachusett; [this is supposed to relate to free negroes of Massachusetts, who, by the laws of other States, when taken up on suspicion of being slaves, are imprisoned and sold out for jail fees;] which he moved to have printed and referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky moved that it do lie upon the table.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 102, nays 49.

So it was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS also presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, denouncing to resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives on the subject of Abolition petitions, as a denial of the right of petition and as unconstitutional, and asking that the same may be rescinded; which Mr. A. moved to refer to a Select Committee, and have printed.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama moved that they do lie on the table.

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 105, nays 64.

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, Jesse A. Bynum, William B. Campbell, John Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Hastings, Hawes, Hill of North Carolina, Hook, George W. Hopkins, Thomas B. Jackson, John Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kemble, King, Leonard, Lucas, McCarty, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Newhard, Nisbet, Parish, Petrikin, Pope, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Sweney, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, W. Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Edward D. White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—105.

Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Howard, Hunt, James, Kempshall, Leet, Lincoln, Lowell, Marvin, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Palen, Parmenter, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, John Smith, Storrs, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Underwood, and P. J. Wagner—64.

So they were laid on the table.

Mr. LINCOLN presented resolves of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, declaring the sense of the Legislature, that the people of that Commonwealth have just cause of complaint on account of the treatment, by the General Government, in withholding the payment of the claims for militia disbursements and expenses incurred by the State in the late war with Great Britain, after the same had been examined and allowed by the officer duly appointed to make such examination: and further declaring, that the course pursued by Congress in this matter toward Massachusetts, is a manifest violation of justice, and that she would not be true to herself if she would consent to remain contented and silent, while she is deprived of her acknowledged rights. Mr. L. moved the printing of the resolves, and their reference to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was ordered accordingly.

Mr. L also offered the petition of Chales White and numerous other citizens of Holden, in the Fifth Congressional District of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the rule of the House of Representatives, excluding from reception petitions on the subject of slavery, and asking its immediate repeal; which petition Mr. L. moved to have referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to report a rescindment of the obnoxious rule: ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. JONES of Virginia called for the orders of the day.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to postpone the orders of the day, for the purpose of continuing the call of the roll for petitions; which was decided in the negative.

Mr. R. GARLAND, from the Select Committee on Printing, asked leave to present the report of the minority of that committee in relation of separating the printing from the political press of the country.

Mr. BLACK objected to the reception of the report of the minority, until the majority were prepared to present their views. The House sometime ago granted the committee further time to prepare their report, and the time had not yet expired; and he intended to avail himself of the full time to report. He was now preparing it, and hoped the House would not authorize the printing of the views of the minority until the majority were ready to report, that both might be printed at the same time.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to suspend the rules to enable him to present the report.

Mr. GRAVES demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 74, nays 89.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. J. W. JONES moved that the House pass to the orders of the day, by resolving itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRAVES asked leave to present a resolution to compel the Committee on Public Printing to make a report.

Mr. BLACK objected to the reception of the resolution, on the ground that it would not be in order for the House to compel the committee to report without rescinding the resolution granting the committee further time to report. The committee would report at the proper time.

Mr. GRAVES moved to suspend the rules to enable him to present the resolution; which was, however, negatived without a count.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. WISE, who was entitled to the floor on the above bill, spoke at some length in relation to the increase in the expenditures. He was followed in reply by Messrs. J. W. JONES and SAMUELS of Virginia.

Mr. STANLY obtained the floor, and made an effort to prove that General Harrison was not an Abolitionist; and quoted from the Emancipator, Philantrophist, and other Abolition papers, to sustain him in the ground he assumed, but was interrupted by Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia, who furnished him with some extracts from Emancipators, of a date prior to those from which he was quoting, as a proof that the editor of that paper advanced the opinion that Gen. Harrison's opinions were favorable to the cause of Abolition.

A debate here arose, in which Messrs. WISE and HOPKINS participated; when the latter gentleman, by the permission of the gentleman of North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] who was still entitled to the floor, moved that the committee rise, which was agreed to; and the committee rose, and the chairman reported progress on the bill, and asked leave to sit again: leave was granted; then,

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE,

The House, at 6 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, April 14, 1840.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the petition of a number of citizens of the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the employment of bloodhounds against the Florida Indians. Mr. S. said that, believing from the late accounts, that these animals were not so dangerous as they were supposed to be, he would not trouble any of the committees with a consideration of the petition; and he would therefore move to lay it on the table. This motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of 1735 citizens of the city of New York, praying for the enactment of a general bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of the city of New York, publishers of periodicals, magazines, &c. praying a reduction of the postage on such publications, so as to bring them down to the same rate of postage as is collected on newspapers: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Charles McKinsey; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. N. also, from the same committee, reported a bill granting to the county of Kent, in the State of Michigan, the right of pre-emption to a quarter section of the public lands; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. N. also, from the same committee, to which were referred

Resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States;

Resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, adverse to the cession of the public lands to the States in which they lie, and in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States; and

The memorial of citizens of Ohio in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States; asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, made the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the several messages of the President of the United States, communicating to Congress, at its present session, certain official correspondence in relation to the question of the territory in dispute with Great Britain on our Northeastern frontier; and also certain resolutions of the Legislature of Maine on the same subject,

REPORT:

That they have had the same under consideration, and now deem it expedient to communicate to the Senate their reasons for not making, at the present moment, a general report upon the whole subject. They feel that they will best perform this duty, by placing clearly and distinctly before the Senate the existing state and condition of the pending negotiation between the two Governments.

The President of the United States, in his annual message of December last, informed Congress that, "for the settlement of our Northeastern boundary, the proposition promised by Great Britain for a commission of exploration and survey, has been received, and a counter project, including also a provision for the certain and final adjustment of the limits in dispute, is now before the British Government for its consideration." The President has not thought it advisable to communicate this counter project to Congress; yet we have his assurance, on which the most confident reliance may be placed, that it is of such a character as will, should it be accepted, finally settle the question. This proposition was officially communicated to that Government during the last summer.

Mr. Fox, the British Minister, in his note of the 24th January last, doubtless with a perfect knowledge of the nature of the project which had been submitted by the American Government to that of Great Britain, assures Mr. Forsyth, "that he not only preserves the hope, but he entertains the firm belief, that if the duty of negotiating the boundary question be left in the hands of the two National Governments, to whom alone of right it belongs, the difficulty of conducting the negotiation to an amicable issue will not be found so great as has been by many persons apprehended." And in his subsequent note of March 13, 1840, he states that he has been instructed to declare, "that her Majesty's Government are only waiting for the detailed report of the British commissioners recently employed to survey the disputed territory, which report, it was believed, would be completed and delivered to her Majesty's Government by the end of the present month, (March,) in order to transmit to the Government of the United States a reply to their last proposal upon the subject of the boundary negotiation." Thus we may reasonably expect that this reply will be received by the President during the present month, (of April,) or early in May.

Whilst such is the condition of the principal negotiation, the committee have deemed it inexpedient, at this time, to report upon the subordinate though important question in relation to the temporary occupation of the disputed territory. They trust that the answer of the British Government may be of such a character as to render a report upon this latter subject unnecessary. In any event, they have every reason to believe that the state of suspense will be but of brief duration.

The committee, ever since this embarrassing and exciting question has been first presented for their consideration, have been anxious that the Government of the United States should constantly preserve itself in the right; and hitherto this desire has been fully accomplished. The territorial rights of Maine have been uniformly asserted, and a firm determination to maintain them has been invariably evinced; though this has been done in an amicable spirit. So far as the committee can exercise any influence over the subject, they are resolved, that if war should be the result, which they confidently hope may not be the case, this war shall be rendered inevitable, by the conduct of the British Government. They have believed this to be the surest mode of uniting every American heart and every American arm in defence of the just rights of the country.

It is but justice to remark, that the Executive branch of the Government has, from the beginning, been uniformly guided by the same spirit, and has thus far pursued a firm, consistent, and prudent course, throughout the whole negotiation with Great Britain.

Whilst the committee can perceive no adequate cause, at the present moment, for anticipating hostilities between the two countries, they would not be understood as expressing the opinion that this country should not be prepared to meet any emergency. The question of peace or war may, in a great degree, depend upon the answer of the British Government now speedily expected.

Mr. WRIGHT called for the reading of the report, and it was read accordingly; after which

Mr. W. observed that in calling for the reading of the report, his only object was to hear the views of the committee, and to give himself an opportunity to move for the printing of an extra number number of copies. He would make that motion for the reason, that within the last few weeks, he believed he might say within the last two weeks, his correspondents, a great many of whom were on the frontiers, seemed to entertain alarming apprehensions of immediate hostilities between this country and England. From what cause he knew not. He had seen nothing himself to authorize such apprehensions, and he was gratified to find that the Committee on Foreign Relations entertained the same opinion.

Mr W. then moved for the printing of ten thousand extra copies of the report.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that the committee had no intention of moving the printing of an extra number of copies of this report, though certainly, as a member of it, he should not oppose the motion. The report was very short, and from the interest generally taken in the subject, it might, and probably would, be copied into all the country papers. He did not believe that it would occupy more than one column in the ordinary sized newspapers, and therefore there was little doubt but it would be extensively circulated. Still, if the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] wished an extra number printed, he should not oppose it. He had only made these suggestions for the information of the gentleman himself, and would be content with any decision that might be made.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky concurred entirely in what had been said by the chairman of the committee, and thought the Senator from New York would hardly deem it necessary to go to the expense of printing ten thousand copies of a document, which, as the chairman said, was so short that it could be copied into all the papers of the country. He thought that it would at once take a general circulation, without being sent out in pamphlet form; and he hoped that if the Senator insisted on the printing, that he would modify his motion so as to print a smaller number.

Mr. CLAY of Ala. recollected that we had had the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the British Minister, on several occasions communicated to the Senate during the present session, and on each occasion ten thousand copies were printed. At all events this was a subject of exciting interest from one end of the Union to the other. If the document was so very small, as alleged by the chairman, it would cost the Government very little to print the extra number of copies.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that his residence was on the frontier, where the people felt a great anxiety on the subject. There was no doubt that the military preparations on the British frontiers had been very briskly carried on during the winter and spring; but his own belief was that these preparations related entirely to the internal condition of the provinces, which furnished sufficient grounds for them. In addition to the late disturbances there, it was known that the British Government was about to attempt a most important change in the government of their colonies on our borders, and this might reasonably be supposed to furnish another reason for the military preparations they have been making. But with the excitement existing on our frontiers, every change on the part of our neighbors was watched by our citizens with an intense interest, which we here at a distance cannot feel, and it was with a desire to allay this excitement that he wished the report to be sent out. He would not persist in the motion if it should be against the pleasure of the Senate, and he was willing to modify it so as to meet the views of all. But he would, at the same time, observe that, if there had been a document which the public would be more anxious to see than any other—if there was one which would be likely to allay the excitement existing on the subject, it was this. He knew that it was very short, and that the cost of printing could not be very great; he knew, too, that notwithstanding the immense circulation of the newspapers of the country, there were many, very many, whom these newspapers did not reach, and that the circulation of a document of this kind, coming immediately from the Senate, would have effect in allaying the apprehensions of our citizens, which a circulation through the newspapers would not.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama rose to say, on the information of the Secretary, that ten thousand copies of all the documents that had been communicated on this subject, during the present session, had been printed.

Mr. RUGGLES said he did not rise to object to the printing of the extra number proposed, nor indeed to advocate the printing of so large a number. It was a very short report, and would be read in the newspapers by every citizen of Maine, and perhaps by every citizen of the country, long before the extra number would be likely to be furnished to the Senate. He had no wish to increase our expenditures for printing, yet he should not oppose any extra number gentlemen thought proper to recommend.

He said he certainly felt less anxiety for printing a large number, from the belief he entertained that the report might have the effect of disappointing many citizens of the State he, in part, represented, in affording them some possible apprehension that the spirit manifested in the late correspondence between the two Governments, is felt less strongly now than at the time that correspondence took place. He was well aware that there was a portion of the people whose minds were fully prepared for the most prompt and energetic measures. Another portion doubtless contemplated a resort to war with serious apprehension. It was not to be questioned that the expectations, if not the hopes, of the former class, would be repressed and disappointed; and that the latter would as certainly derive encouragement to their desire for the long continuance of peace. He observed that Maine felt strongly and deeply on this subject. She had entertained hopes that this controversy was now about to be brought to a close. She is expecting strong, decisive and energetic action on the part of this Government. He did not mean to be understood as intimating that the tone and spirit of the report of the committee afforded any sufficient evidence that she would be disappointed in the character of the measures she has been anticipating. Nevertheless, the report, he believed, would by many be looked upon as a peace document, and as calculated to relieve the country from all apprehension of a rupture with Great Britain, at least for some time to come. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] appeared to have so understood its purport and effect, and assigned that as a reason for wishing a large number of the report printed. He would say again that he should not oppose the printing of any number gentlemen wished; but it would be recollected that the Senate had ordered the printing of ten thousand extra copies of a correspondence on this subject, early in March, which were not furnished to the Senate for several weeks afterwards; and not till after the recent correspondence on the same subject, was communicated to the Senate. Should there be as much delay on this occasion, the extra copies would be of but little use to the Senate or to the public.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that the remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. RUGGLES] seemed to render it necessary that he should say a very few words on the subject before the Senate. Those who had attended to the reading of the report, would perceive that, throughout, it was intended for the sole purpose of presenting to the Senate the reasons why the committee did not think it necessary, at this time, to make a detailed report on the whole correspondence. That was the single object of the report. If it should become necessary to make a report in regard to the temporary occupation of the disputed territory, the committee would not shrink from their duty. They were prepared to perform it to the Senate and to the country. But at this moment, when we have the solemn assurance of the British Minister that in a very short time we should have an answer from his Government to the counter projet presented by our Government; and when he not only expresses the hope, but "entertains the firm belief," that the "difficulty of conducting the negotiation to an amicable issue will not be found so great as has been by many persons apprehended," it is wondeful that the Senator from Maine should denounce this report, made under such circumstances, in such strong language. The report, Mr. B. continued, reasserted the rights of Maine in the most solemn manner; and it was extraordinary that any citizen of Maine should expect a detailed report, or one different from that which had been made, unless, indeed, he could believe that the committee ought to have assumed a hostile position, and gone into all the correspondence that had taken place, and into the subject of the preparations that had been made by the British Government, in the very face of the assurance that we should have an answer to our proposition in the course of this month or the next; which, judging from the language of the British Minister, we had reason to believe would prove satisfactory. The committee thought it was their duty to place before the Senate the precise state of the negotiation between the two countries; and what that was might be summed up in twenty words. A proposition for an exploration and survey of the disputed territory had been made by the British Government; and this Government not deeming it satisfactory, because it did not embrace a provision for the final settlement of the question, had sent to the British Government a counter projet, to which no answer has yet been received. This counter projet was communicated to the British Government during the last summer, and the British Minister here, several months afterwards, with a perfect knowledge of its character, assures us that a speedy answer will be given to it, and expresses his confident belief that if this controversy is left to the two national Governments, it does not present the difficulties which had been by many persons apprehended. He also declares that the commissioners who had been sent out from England to make a survey of the disputed territory, were preparing their report—that this report would be ready within the month of March—and that then his Government would transmit an answer to the proposition we had submitted to them. Now in this state of the case, unless you suppose the British Government to be entirely faithless, which he had no reason to believe, we may reasonably expect, in this or the coming month, to receive an answer that may enable us to settle this question in conformity with the stipulations of the treaty of 1783, and in accordance with the just rights of Maine. Under such circumstances, how could it be expected that the committee would make a belligerant report? Mr. B. differed with the Senator from Maine in the opinion that the people of his State either would or could so construe this report, as to imagine that the committee or the Senate were prepared to surrender any portion of their rights. The past conduct of this body should shield them from such a suspicion, and their future conduct, should it become necessary, would show that they were as ready now as they have been in former times, to sustain the honor of the nation as well as the rights of a sovereign member of the Confederacy. From the correspondence which had taken place between the two Governments, the committee hoped that this might never become necessary. Sufficient for the day was the evil thereof; and the committee thought the subject was already sufficiently embarrassing in itself, without unnecessarily adding to it other causes of irritation.

Mr. ALLEN wished to ask of the Senator from Maine one or two questions. He wished to know if the gentleman expected the committee to report to the Senate an opinion in favor of war, or what kind of report he expected from the Committee in the present state of the negotiations between the two countries. When the gentleman should state what kind of a report he expected the committee to make, he would then thank him to state what kind of a report he himself would make, and then the people might judge of the correctness of his views on this subject. Whilst up, Mr. A. said he would make one or two additional remarks. The only question which the Committee on Foreign Relations had to decide, (and he believed that since he had been here he had given as much evidence of a devotion to the interest of the State of Maine, as any other Senator,) the only question before the committee was not whether they would recommend measures leading to war, but whether they would recommend any thing at all—whether they should not remain silent till the expected answer to our proposition to the British Government should be received. That was the only question before the committee. Under these circumstances the committee concluded, after full reflection, that it would be better, in order to avoid any misunderstanding in the country—in order to avoid the people putting any false construction on the late correspondence, to make a report to explain not what was the course it was our duty to pursue at the present moment, but the reasons why we should suspend any action till the British Government should return an answer to the counter projet we had made to them. The committee made this report in pursuance of that opinion, to explain why they did not, at this time, go into a thorough investigation of the subject, and propose some definite action in regard to it; and the reasons which governed them were, that the British Minister here had declared that he would very soon be able to present to this Government an answer to the proposition which had been submitted to his. Mr. A. deemed it proper to make these few remarks, because the State from which he came, ever patriotic, had passed resolutions in relation to this subject, and he knew that the people of that State would stand ready, to the last man, and to the last dollar of their resources, to see that the rights of the whole country were maintained at all hazards. He would now ask the Senator from Maine to state what kind of a report this committee ought, in his opinion, to have made—what kind of proposition ought to have been submitted to the nation in the present state of the negotiations between the two countries.

Mr. RUGGLES said he had been referred to as denouncing the report of the committee. He had not intended to be so understood. He had spoken of the impression he believed it would make on different classes in the community. He had expressed the opinion that those who were looking for prompt and energetic measures—who were, in fact, looking with impatience for an immediate rupture between the two countries, would have these hopes repressed; and that others, who felt alarmed at the tone of the correspondence lately communicated to the Senate, would be relieved from their apprehensions; and he repeated that the Senator from New York, who had just taken his seat, appeared to entertain the same opinion of the effect the report was calculated to have on the people of the frontier of that State, who were excited with the prospect of an immediate declaration of war.

In answer to the question put to him by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN] whether he would have the committee make a report in favor of an immediate declaration of war, he would say that he had no such wish, nor had he intimated any such desire. In answer to the Senator's further inquiry what sort of a report he would have the committee make, he would not undertake to dictate to the intelligent and patriotic Committee on Foreign Relations, what sort of a report they should make on this or any other subject. He would not undertake to say that they ought to make any other report than they had made, if they were to make any report at all at this time. He believed that nothing new had transpired to render any report necessary at this particular time. The report communicated no new facts. The Senate well knew, and the country well knew, that the President had caused to be made to the British Government a counter proposition, and that we were expecting a response to that proposition in all this month, or early in the next. This information had been communicated by the President, and was contained in the last correspondence, which was before the country. He understood that the further consideration of the Maine question was postponed till that response should be received. A report from the committee on Foreign Relations had not been looked for till it should appear whether we have, at the time indicated, the promised reply of the British Government. He had acquiesced in that, and had expressed no wish for a report at this time, in favor of ultra measures. So far from that, he said he did not believe, nor had he at any time believed, that war with Great Britain would necessarily grow out of this controversy. He founded his opinion partly on the fact, that on her part she had no cause for war. Her claim to the disputed territory was wholly without foundation, and would not afford her the slightest justification for pursuing it to that extremity. She would not dare go to war with this country, without some better cause for it. She had too much respect for the opinion of mankind to enter into such a contest with us without some better pretence than the groundless claim she has set up.

But, sir, said Mr. R. can Great Britain be greatly blamed for pushing her claims, as baseless as they are, whilst she has heretofore seen so little to create a belief that this Government would resist them to the last extremity? He remembered to have urged at the last, and at previous sessions, the fortification of some exposed points on the maritime frontier of Maine. He proposed it as an amendment to an appropriation bill then before the Senate, and had the silent vote, in support of it, of the chairman on Military Affairs; but it was voted down by a large majority. He had not forgotten it; and could not forget the exposed condition of the whole country. His opinion that war would not ensue, was necessarily subject to the condition, that preparation should be immediately made to meet any possible contingency.

We could never expect a submission to our rights till we give substantial indications of a determination to vindicate them. We must prepare for war to avoid war. Sir, said Mr. R. without finding any fault with the report, he would say that he had much rather have seen a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, and another from the Committee on Naval Affairs, affording on the part of this Government an earnest of its determination to vindicate the rights of Maine and the honor of the nation.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky begged leave to say a few words on the subject, not so much in reference to the particular question of printing the report, as on the general and more important one involving the relations between this country and Great Britain. He was happy to hear the Senator from Maine [Mr. RUGGLES] say he was not for war, though he did remark when he first rose that this report would be unsatisfactory to a portion of the people of his State who were for war. He would say that if there was any party in this country for war with Great Britain, it was a criminal party. There was no sufficient cause for war; and he took occasion to say, that so far as he was informed, the opinions both of the Administration party, and of the party with which he acted, were that war was to be be avoided so long as it could be done without compromitting the rights and honor of the nation. The Senate had solemnly expressed the opinion that the question of right was with us, and all parties, every individual of those parties, so far as their views had been expressed, seemed determined to obtain for Maine, by some of those modes by which national rights are asserted, a full and absolute possession of all the territory within her rightful limits. But he must say that there were two modes of arriving at this result. One was by negotiation, and the other was by war; and these questions were to be decided by the united voice of the whole country, and by the Executive branch of the Government, as the case may be, and not to be decided by the voice of one single member of the Confederacy. If the honor of the country is assailed, the councils of the whole country must determine as to the manner and time of vindicating it. He would take occasion to say for the benefit of the Senator from Maine, and the whole people of Maine, that whilst he believed them to be as valorous and as enlightened as any people in the Union, he was not inclined to confide in their judgment as to declaring war, and the period at which this last resort may become necessary. If Maine expects the Government of this country to secure her rights, she must confide to the Government of this country the whole agency in settling the controversy. If it is to be done by negotiation, it must be left to the Executive and his constitutional advisers. If it is to be by war, it should be left to that department of the Government to which the power of declaring war is confided by the Constitution. In saying all this, he meant nothing in condemnation of the state of feeling that had been evinced by the people of Maine. Justice was with her, and he sympathized with her natural feelings on this subject. Her claims had unfortunately too long been delayed; but, notwithstanding that, he said that this Government alone should conduct the negotiation, and if war became necessary, decide upon the time and manner of commencing it. He could not, however, believe that this last resort would be necessary. There were two securities which we had for the continuance of peace. The first security was that Great Britain, enlightened as her councils were, must perceive, what we know, that the right was with us; that she had no claim; and after being satisfied with these facts, upon an examination of the necessary information, will ultimately concede the right to us. But let me suppose, continued Mr. C. that she does not. Let me suppose that, after investigation, she comes to the clear conviction to which we have arrived, that the right is with her; that the territory in dispute, according to the treaty of 1783, is within her limits. What, then, will be the case presented before the world? Two enlightened nations coming to different conclusions on the same testimony, and unable to agree. What, then, are to be the consequences? Is war, that calamity which every lover of humanity must deprecate, the only alternative? No, sir. There is another: there is a subsisting treaty stipulation contained in the treaty of Ghent, by which this question is to be left to the decision of an impartial tribunal, in the event that the two countries cannot settle it themselves. I say there is a treaty stipulation still subsisting; and how do I make it out? It may be alleged that the matter having been once committed to the umpirage of a third party, and that party having given an award, the stipulation in the treaty was fulfilled, and it was no longer in force. Not so. There was an attempt at arbitration, through the instrumentality of the King of Holland; but it was an abortion—a failure—the King did not settle the question; both parties acknowledged that he did not, and the treaty remains in full force, binding the parties to refer this question, if unable to settle it amicably themselves, to an impartial tribunal. But, putting the treaty out of the question, suppose there was no such stipulation, and that the two parties having brought their minds to the conclusion that the right was with each, were determined to persist on it. Sooner than resort to war, with all its calamities, both parties should agree to arbitration; and I say that England, if she will not concede the right to us, must yield the point at issue to arbitration. Though this course may be attended with delay—though Maine may not arrive at the possession of her territory as soon as she wishes, yet she had infinitely better wait the movements of two great nations, than that they should be involved in war. When we come to deciding on the question of war, all other means of settling the controversy having failed, that question is to be decided by the united wisdom of all, in reference to the condition of the whole country, in reference to the other interests of Maine besides the interest in question, and in reference to the probable issue of the controversy.

In relation to the military preparations of the British in the Canadas, of which the Senator spoke, Mr. C. said, they gave him no cause for alarm. England was the weaker power—she was preparing against invasion from us; but did we apprehend invasion from the Canadas? He did not agree with the Senator that our state of preparation was so defective; for, with the exception of one or two points on the Atlantic, where some additional defence was wanted, no preparation was necessary. When gentlemen talked of our want of preparation, he did not agree with them. What! with fifteen or sixteen millions of free people, with their unquestioned valor, their love of country, combined with their means of transportation, and their warlike resources, to say that the country is unprepared! We are, said Mr. C. ten thousand times better prepared for war to-morrow with Great Britain—though not so much so, in all respects, as he could wish—we are infinitely better prepared than we were at a former period—on the ocean, as on the land, on the lakes as well as the bays; and then we came out of the contest with honor. The construction of the great New York canal, our railroads, our population pressing up against the boundary line—all these are advantages which we did not possess in the last war. No preparation! Sir, we have the best preparations that ever a country boasted of: we have sixteen millions of freemen, with stout arms and bold hearts, who stand ready to vindicate the rights of their country. As to the preparations of England in the Canadas, let her go on with them—let her bring her troops over, whether to quell insurrections among her own people or to guard against invasion from our side of the line—that would never, for a moment, give him the slightest uneasiness. Whenever the honor of the country, by an injury inflicted on a single member of it, may require us to resort to a war, though the beginning of it may be attended with a few disasters, he had no apprehension but, after a few months, we may be able to impress on England the temerity of forcing us into this alternative.

He entirely concurred with the report. He believed that it was the sincere desire of the Administration party to preserve the peace of the country, and it had been a matter of serious inquiry with him to ascertain their views. If there was a criminal party in this country, who, for their own sinister views, desired a war, he did not believe that the Administration party gave them the slightest countenance. This he must say as an act of justice. The committee were unanimous in adopting this report. What did it tell you? Why, that the negotiations were going on, and were in the hands of those constitutionally entrusted with it; and that within a reasonable period, we might expect an answer to our last proposition, till when it did not become us to take any further action on the subject. Mr. C. after alluding to the various causes which might reasonably be supposed to delay the action of the British Ministry, concluded by saying that his only object in rising, was to defend the report, and not to say any thing on the question of printing. He did not think the printing of the extra copies necessary, as the report would be circulated through the newspapers.

Mr. RUGGLES rose but to say a word in explanation. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had expressed satisfaction that he (Mr. R.) had said he was not for war. He could not let the remark pass without a little qualification. He was for peace, if peace could be preserved consistently with the rights and honor of the country. If not, then he was ready for the alternative. He said he would add a word in respect to submitting the matter in controversy to arbitration. He did not mean to discuss, at this time, the right of this Government to refer the question to an arbiter without the assent of Maine, and against her protestation; but he would remind the Senator that Maine had, over and over again, by her Legislature, declared her opinion that the Federal Government had not the constitutional power, and ought not to jeopard her rights by a submission of them to abitrators without her assent. That opinion had been so strongly entertained by Maine, that he felt, in some sort, instructed upon that point, and could not yield it. But he saw no occasion for discussing that question now. He referred to writers on the laws of nations who maintained fully that no nation could be called upon to submit to the umpirage of others, a clear and indubitable right, which she was justified in claiming as such. But he would not pursue the subject.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, in reply, said, that he did not express the opinion that this Government had claimed the right to refer this question to arbitration; but he expressed, as his unqualified opinion, that this Government had the undoubted right to refer the question to arbitration, without consulting Maine.

The question was then taken, and the motion to print ten thousand extra copies of the report was agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase for the United States the banking-house of the old Bank of Alexandria, and to credit the debit due by said bank for the amount of the purchase money: read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the bill for incorporating the Bank of the District of Columbia, and

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, the various bills respecting banking corporations in the District, were made the special order of the day for next Monday two weeks.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi in relation to the relinquishment and exchange of the sixteenth sections, reserved for the use of schools, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the same be laid on the table, for the reason that a bill had already been reported on the subject. This motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the same committee was also discharged from the further consideration of three several memorials from the State of Alabama; one from the General Assembly of that State, asking for the extension of the right of pre-emption; and two from citizens of the State, asking for the establishment of an additional land office in the Cherokee country, for the sale of the lands lately acquired from those Indians. Mr. C. said that bills having been reported on these subjects, he would move to lay the memorials on the table, after discharging the committee from them. This motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the same committee was also discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Lake Superior Fishing and Mining Company of the State of Michigan, praying to be allowed the right of working the mineral lands belonging to the United States along the southern shore of Lake Superior in the said State; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of J. H. Relfe, which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. from the same committee, made adverse reports on the bills from the House for the relief of John Howe and Chauncey Calhoun, and also made an adverse report on the petition of Abner L. Duncan.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Pubic Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Henry Willis; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. F. on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Richard K. Call; which was read twice, and referred.

The joint resolution directing the Committee on the Library to take measures for the importation and erection of the statue of Washington by Greenhough;

The bill for the relief of Clements, Bryan and Company;

The bill for the relief of George W. Paschall;

The bill for the relief of Margaret Barnes; and

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants of land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the twenty-sixth day of May, eighteen hundred and twenty-four, and an act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said acts to claimants to land within the State of Louisiana and Mississippi;

were severally read a third time and passed.

The bill granting to the State of Michigan a quantity of land to aid said State in the construction of a canal around the falls of St. Marie, was taken up on its third reading, and was opposed by Messrs. CLAY and CRITTENDEN, and advocated by Messrs. NORVELL and PORTER, and after some further remarks by Messrs. ALLEN and TAPPAN, amendments were offered by Messrs. WHITE and HENDERSON, and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

The bill for the relief of James Dutton;

The bill for the relief of Peter Warner of Indiana; and were considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A bill for the relief of Samuel White;

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill relative to the iron steamer, the New Jersey, reported the same with an amendment; which was agreed to.

The bill was then, on motion by Mr. K. taken up as in Committee of the Whole, considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, it was Ordered, That Friday and Saturday next be devoted to the consideration of private bills, and the reports of committees on private bills.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, April 14, 1840.

Mr. PETRIKIN, by general consent, introduced a proposition to print the communication of the President, now lying on the table, in answer to a certain resolution reported by the order of the Committee on the Public Buildings and Public Grounds.

Mr. J. W. JONES asked the general consent of the House to take up the motion which he submitted a few days ago, to print 2,500 copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the condition of the banks throughout the United States.

Mr. ANDREWS said he objected.

Mr. JONES had supposed that every member of the body wanted to see the condition of the banks.

Mr. ANDREWS inquired the size of the document.

Mr. JONES replied that it was quite voluminous; which was the reason that he had moved the printing of the 2,500 copies only.

Mr. ANDREWS withdrew his objection; and the resolution was agreed to.

The CHAIR then announced that the business first in order was the report of the Select Committee on Printing, which had been made the special order of the day for this day.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he wished to offer a resolution for the postponement of the special order; which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the execution of the special order on the report of the Committee on Printing, be postponed until the House shall have finally disposed of the bill No. 8, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government, and that the said special order be then taken up and considered as though no postponement thereof had been made.

Mr. R. GARLAND, before the adoption of the resolution, wished to present the report of the minority of that committee on the other branch of the subject referred to that committee.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired of the CHAIR, (there being two special orders,) which took precedence, and whether the civil and diplomatic bill did not, as a matter of course, override and postpone the special order relating to the printing.

The CHAIR replied that Speaker STEVENSON had decided that the special order first made took priority. The subject of printing was the first special order, and would therefore take precedence.

Mr. R. GARLAND again presented his report from the minority.

Mr. CONNER objected to the reception of the report from the minority, until the chairman of the committee should be present, and make the report of the committee. It would be very irregular to receive the views of the minority, until it was done. He had no objection, further than that it would be unprecedented, until the majority's report was received. The chairman gave notice, on yesterday, that he would be prepared to report to-day, and he hoped the subject would be delayed till he was present.

Mr. DROMGOOLE protested against all the proceeding, as out of order, while the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] was pending.

Mr. BLACK, at this stage of the proceeding, made his appearance, and said, when the subject came up, he was prepared to report.

The CHAIR inquired of the gentleman whether he wished to make the report.

Mr. BLACK said he was under the impression that the appropriation bill took precedence.

The CHAIR informed him otherwise.

Mr. LEET said if both branches of the committee were prepared to report, he would suggest that both reports be received, and ordered to be printed; and that the question be then taken on the resolution to postpone. Accordingly,

Mr. BLACK, chairman of the committee, reported the views of the majority; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, from the same committee, reported the views of the minority, accompanied by a bill.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to the minority reporting any bill; they had no right by the rules to do so—it was unprecedented.

Mr. R. GARLAND intimated that he would withdraw the bill, and present a series of resolutions, to effect the same object, to accompany the report.

Mr. BLACK said the committee had authorized no bill to be reported; and he objected to it as unusual and irregular.

The report was received and ordered to be printed; but the bill accompanying it was understood not to be received; but by courtesy ordered to be printed.

The resolution offered by the chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. JONES, of Va.) to postpone the subject, having been read,

Mr. RUSSELL hoped that the subject could be so modified as not to have the special order operate to postpone the private business on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. J. W. JONES said he would be willing to agree to a simple postponement of the special order, which would require but a majority; but he had no desire to put the subject on a different footing than that which it had already occupied before the House.

Mr. R. GARLAND said he would object to the resolution, if it changed the question from a special order.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to without a count.

Mr. J. JOHNSON of Virginia asked leave to submit a report from the Committee of Accounts, in relation to the accounts of Langtree and O'Sullivan. He said that all its members, with the exception of one, had concurred in the report; and that a minority report would be presented to the House.

Mr. WISE objected.

Mr. JOHNSON moved a suspension of the rules, and the question was taken by count; and there being ayes 79, noes 40, and no quorum voting,

Mr. BELL said he presumed the object of the chairman was to get the report printed, and that it would not give rise to debate.

Mr. JOHNSON replied that the report was a voluminous one, and that debate would not take place until its contents were known to the House. The object was merely to let both reports be received, and have them printed. He presumed there could be no debate on a motion to print.

Mr. WISE gave notice that he would debate it the moment it touched the CLERK's table.

Mr. PETRIKIN also gave notice that he would debate it.

Mr. JOHNSON again moved a suspension of the rules, and called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—ayes 128, nays 28.

So the rules were suspended, and

Mr. JOHNSON sent the report to the CHAIR; and asked that it be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York said the House would see, by the minority report, that the Committee of Accounts was required, by the resolution of — March, to inquire into the qualification of, and the prices paid for, the stationery furnished to the House by Langtree and O'Sullivan, and contrast them with those of the stationery furnished to the Senate, and to send for persons and papers. Mr. J. said, by referring to the minority report, it would be seen that the committee had refused to do so.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the report be recommitted to the Committee of Accounts, with additional instructions to enquire and report to this House,

1. Whether the prices paid by the CLERK of this House for stationery, is a reasonable price, when compared with what stationery can be purchased for from other persons, of like quality.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior kind, when compared with the stationery purchased for this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. Whether any allowance was asked by the CLERK, either in writing or verbally, for the difference in exchange between Philadelphia and New York; and, if any, how much?

4. Whether any payment has been made by the CLERK to the contractor, in advance, on his contract, or the auditing of his account by the committee?

Mr. EVERETT called for the reading of the reports.

Mr. WISE wanted to know how much of the report was the work of the committee, and how much was the work of the officer whose accounts were to be investigated, and hoped it would be read.

The reports having been partially read through, and the morning hour, to which the suspension of the rules applied, having expired,

Mr. J. W. JONES called for the orders of the day; before passing to which, however,

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, which were appropriately disposed of:

1. From the Treasury Department, containing a statement of the expenditures and estimates of the Treasury building, and the Patent Office.

2. From the War Department, in relation to the claims of Tennessee volunteers.

3. From the Treasury Department, containing the amount of receipts under the treaty of indemnity with France, and the dividend or per centage payable on each case.

4. Depositions in relation to the New Jersey election.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole, (Mr CASEY in the chair,) and took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. STANLY being entitled to the floor, spoke, the purport of which may be judged of by the reply of

Mr. STEENROD, who said he wished to make a single remark by way of reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, in relation to his charges against Judge Tappan. He was not present at the time and place when the conversation was said to have taken place between the Judge and Collier, therefore he could not speak of that. But he wished to say that he had some knowledge of Judge Tappan, having been intimately acquainted with him for several years, and associated with him in the practice of law for a long period. He had again and again conversed with him on the subject, and he would inform the gentleman from North Carolina that he had heard Judge Tappan as repeatedly denounce and ridicule the Abolitionists. He (Mr. S.) would not have intruded upon the time of the committee, if he had not believed that the gentleman from North Carolina was doing injustice to the respected Senator from Ohio. He thought that, knowing what he did of the sentiments of the Senator, it would be unkind for him to remain silent and hear him denounced. If the gentleman from North Carolina wished to obtain an accurate knowledge of the opinions of Judge Tappan on the question of Abolition, let him read the letter written by him in answer to certain interrogatories put to him by a committee previous to his election, and when he was a candidate for Senator. The gentleman would find that, on that occasion, Judge Tappan had taken similar ground.

Mr. WISE asked where the letter was, and whether, in the letter, Judge Tappan had taken the position that slavery was unconstitutional.

Mr. STEENROD was understood to reply that Judge Tappan had taken the ground that slavery in the abstract was an evil; but that the Federal Government had no right to interfere with it. Mr. S. then adverted to the recent conduct of Mr. Tappan in refusing to present Abolition petitions in the Senate, and asked where there was another man, coming from a non-slaveholding State, who had done the same. Yes, he would ask, where was the man from beyond Mason and Dixon's line, who had taken such high ground on the Abolition question as that Senator? And yet, notwithstanding all this, the gentleman from North Carolina has chosen to attack him.

Mr. S. subsequently said, that until this session he had never heard of the conversation which was said to have taken place between Judge Tappan and Collier; but he would repeat, that he had again and again conversed with Judge Tappan on the subject of Abolition, when the latter had invariably denounced and ridiculed the conduct of the fanatics.

Mr. WISE said that he had published an address to his constituents, in which he had taken the ground that the testimony of Collier and others of Ohio was true; but if his colleague controverted that testimony, he was willing to retract that which had been founded upon it. But he would say that the truth of the testimony in question was vouched to him by respectable gentlemen. They had stated as a fact that Judge Tappan did deride and ridicule fanaticism, and Collier says so too; but in what manner? Collier says that Judge Tappan derided the Abolitionists because they employed peaceable means, and that he had said if the negroes wanted arms and knives to cut the throats of their masters, he would furnish them. Also, that when asked if he were standing on the banks of the Ohio, and witnessed a servile insurrection, whether he would help to suppress it, he said "No, by G—d;" and that if he had a son that would do it, he would disinherit him.

Mr. STEENROD was understood to say that he would reply when he replied to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] but after Mr. STANLY had finished, he was prevented from doing so by Mr. DAWSON, who obtained the floor, and said he did not rise to discuss the bill now under consideration; if he were to attempt to do so, according to the manner of debate, it would be out or order. But he rose for the purpose of making an effort to draw the committee to the consideration of the business of the country now legitimately before the committee. The House had been five days in committee on this bill, but the subject which had been discussed during that time was the Presidential question. The State of Ohio first led off in the irrelevant and unjustifiable course of debate on this bill, but we had nothing to do with either with Gen. Harrison or Abolitionism here. Let the gentleman from North Carolina confine his remarks to the bill before the committee, and leave other questions to be decided at their proper time. If the gentleman from North Carolina objected to any item of the bill, let him point it out, so that it might be considered. But, in his opinion, the character of General Harrison had been sufficiently descanted upon. The course this debate had taken was incompatible with the public interest, and with their character as members of a legislative body.

He considered the character of Major General William Henry Harrison as ably defended from the imprudent attacks made upon him by his enemies. He, for one, confessed that his opinion of General H. had been vastly changed by the discussion. Mr. D. said the question of Abolition had also been improperly introduced into the debate, in relation to the principles of men with whom we have nothing to do. He considered that this question of President-making, and the reciprocal charges of Abolition, had been fairly discussed. Five months of the session had elapsed, and they had about two months and a half to do business; and now (said Mr. D.) let us come forward and do the business of the country, and then we can go before the people in our districts, and there discuss the Presidential question. He, for one, would do this, and would be glad to do it. If there was any particular item which should be rejected, they could enlighten the country on the subject of appropriations in the discussion which might take place on it. But let us make these appropriations. The Government had called for them, and must have them. Let us make them, and the responsibility must rest upon the Government for their proper disbursement. He did not intend, when he rose, to say one word to give offence to any gentleman who had taken part in the discussion. He considered that those with whom he was associated, had acted entirely on the defensive. He would not discuss the bill at this time; but he would probably do so at another time; and would then discuss the particular proposition before the House.

Mr. GRAVES replied in opposition to the views of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON.] He entered his protest on the sort of criticism used by that gentleman.

Mr. MARVIN did not rise to make a speech on the bill, but to make some brief remarks on the strange course this debate had taken. They were, as he understood, in Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government. On the first day of the debate, he had listened with attention, expecting to hear nothing but what had some reference to the bill. But, to his great surprise, in the midst of the debate, an entirely foreign subject was introduced, and an attack made in reference to the opinions of one of the candidates for the Presidency. What had the Presidential question to do with the subject before the committee? He appealed to his Southern friends, without distinction of party, whether it was proper that an Abolition debate should spring up, day after day, when, by their vote, they had previously decided that this subject should not be introduced or discussed in any shape whatever.

They had determined, some time ago, that the subject of Abolition should in no way be discussed, yet, day after day, members were reading from Abolition papers, to prove that somebody is or is not in favor of, or opposed to Abolition. He could not understand what this had to do with the bill under consideration.

In the early part of the debate, the gentleman from Ohio had made some remarks in relation to the price of labor, the currency, etc. and had stated that there was no distress in the country except among speculators. At that time he did wish an opportunity to reply, that he might correct that erroneous statement, and convince the gentleman that that distress existed among others, besides speculators; also, of telling him that Mr. Van Buren, the leader of his party, had given his cognovit that there was general distress through the land.

But the least reflection would show we had a great amount of important business to transact before our adjournment. For himself, he desired to go home in June, and did not wish to remain through the hot weather until the fall, and then perhaps without doing the business before them. He was therefore strongly desirous that gentlemen should confine themselves to the real and direct questions before them, and restrain this unparalleled latitude of debate. Let gentlemen take one thing at a time, and pass upon it; then they would act with some intelligence.

He was aware it was very difficult to lay down any general rule by which their deliberations might be controlled; but each member, and each individual, must be the judge of what course it would be best to pursue. There was a feeling in the House like this: a member would get up, and, in the course of debate, would say something, or make some charge against a political opponent. He would be called to order; but his friends would say to the other party, "What; are you afraid to have the qualifications of your candidate considered?" Cries would then arise of, "go on," "go on;" and thus imperceptibly they were drawn into a debate having no connection whatever with the legitimate business before them. The debate was one of that nature, and urged by this feeling. Members had gone on continually in making political charges, and replying to them from day to day, until they had nearly lost sight of the bill. He thought there was much good sense in the remark of the gentleman from Georgia, in reference to the improper introduction of the Presidential question, in this debate. It appeared to him that members did not properly appreciate the intelligence of the people of this country. All these Abolition papers, from which extracts had been made, were published all through the country, and had been read by their constituents, and those constituents were fully able to form their own judgment on the questions involved. If the people should choose to elect Harrison, they would do so notwithstanding all the speeches made in Congress. Mr. M. concluded by entreating members of both parties to leave the Presidential question to be settled by the people, while they transacted the great mass of legislative business pressing with so much urgency upon them.

Mr. OGLE obtained the floor, and wished to call the attention of the committee to the amendments which he should offer to the bill under consideration, in respect to the salaries of the Ministers to Russia, Austria, Prussia, Spain, and Mexico; and salaries of Secretaries of Lgation, Chargés, expenses of missions abroad, the salary paid to the signer of patents, &c.; and, after a few remarks, moved that the committee rise.

And, on the question being taken, resulted—ayes 55, noes 47, no quorum voting; but a majority having decided,

The committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. PETRIKIN here took exception to the report of the chairman of the Committee on the state of the Union. He raised a point of order whether it was not the duty of the chairman to report that the committee found itself without a quorum.

Mr. BRIGGS said a majority of the committee had agreed to rise, and did not authorize its chairman to report the fact of there being no quorum.

Mr. PETRIKIN did not press his point of order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; which were ordered, and were—yeas 49, nays 68.

So the House refused to adjourn. No quorum voted; but

The SPEAKER said there was evidently a quorum present.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then withdrew his motion for a call of the House, and

The House then again resolved itself into Committee of the whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. DROMGOOLE made some remarks in relation to confining the discussion on this bill to the particular portions immediately under consideration.

Mr. OGLE then resumed the floor, and moved to strike out the appropriation for repairs of the furniture in the President's House, &c.

The CHAIR decided that it was not in order to move the amendment until the clause to which it related was reached, but that the bill generally was open for debate.

Mr. OGLE then spoke at some length in relation to the furniture in the President's House; and, in the course of his remarks, referred to the following paragraph, which appeared in the Globe of yesterday, copied from a Northern paper, viz:

"Mr. Andrews, a good Whig member from Kentucky, who possesses all the blunt honesty which characterizes the people of that State, whilst dining with the President, observed a splendid service of gold plate upon the table, and taking one of the golden spoons in his hand, said to the President, 'Mr. Van Buren, if you will let me take this spoon to Kentucky, and show it to my constituents, I will promise not to make use of any other argument against you—this will be enough.' "

"When articles like this are circulated through the Federal press, and regarded as second only to log cabins and hard cider, it may be deemed excusable to say, that the gold plates, spoons, knives and forks, which have figured so largely of late in the Opposition papers, are the same which the President found in the White House when he took possession; that the plates, instead of gold, are simple china, purchased in Mr. Monroe's time—the spoons, knives and forks, (neither of which are gold,) procured, it is believed, during each of the administrations of Monroe, Adams, and Jackson, having received no additions or improvements from Mr. Van Buren."

Mr. OGLE was commenting on the above, and was understood to deny the truth of the comments of the Globe, when he was interrupted by

Mr. ANDREWS, who asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield the floor to him to make an explanation. Mr. A. stated that some weeks since he had heard that such a publication as the one just read from the Globe was going the rounds of many of the Eastern papers. That it had not been his practice heretofore—nor did he intend, for the future, to deviate from that practice—to notice the manner in which his name might be used in connection with newspaper publications or gossip of the day; but as the gentleman from Pennsylvania had referred to that publication, it was due to himself, as a gentleman, to say that no such conversation had taken place between him and the President. It was true, that, with other gentlemen of the House, he had the honor to dine during the winter with the President, and it was due to truth and his own sense of propriety and justice, to say that the President treated him as a gentleman, and he trusted that it had been his fortune to treat the President in like manner.

Mr. OGLE resumed his remarks and eulogized the character of General Harrison; but, before concluding, gave way to

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was agreed to, and the committee rose; and

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair, the chairman of the Committee on the state of the Union, reported progress on the bill, and asked leave to sit again; which leave was granted; after which,

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH,

The House adjourned.

Mr. NORVELL explained at some length the provisions of the bill, and advocated its passage.

Mr. MERRICK opposed the bill, and moved its recommitment to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions so to amend it as to make an equal grant to all the States in the Union.

The motion to recommit was discussed by Messrs. WALKER, MERRICK, CLAY of Kentucky, and NORVELL, when, on motion of Mr. N. it was laid on the table.

LAWS OF NATIONS.

The resolutions submitted on the 4th of March by Mr. CALHOUN, as amended by the Committee on Foreign Relations, were taken up, and were read, as follows:

Resolved, That a ship or a vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, is, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs; as much so as if constituting a part of its own domain.

Resolved, That if such ship or vessel should be forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into the port, and under the jurisdiction of a friendly power, she and her cargo, and persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be placed under the protection which the laws of nations extend to the unfortunate under such circumstances.

Resolved, That the brig Enterprise, which was forced unavoidably by stress of weather into Port Hamilton, Bermuda island, while on a lawful voyage on the high seas from one port of the Union to another, comes within the principles embraced in the foregoing resolutions; and that the seizure and detention of the negroes on board by the local authority of the island, was an act in violation of the laws of nations, and highly unjust to our own citizens to whom they belong.

Mr. CLAY said that, with respect to the general principles contained in the resolutions, as that the flag should protect its vessels on the high seas, there could be no doubt. It was the common highway of nations, and vessels under their flags were, to all intents and purposes, protected by them. On the high seas no nation had exclusive jurisdiction.

As the resolutions were amended by the committee, they were undoubtedly correct; but, as originally drafted, he had some doubts of the principles set forth. He could not think that in the port of a foreign power, when the flag was consequently under a particular jurisdiction, that its protection was as great and unrestricted as when the vessel was at sea.

He had risen, however, not to discuss the principles contained in these resolutions, but rather to inquire what good could result, what benefit was proposed, by their introduction at the present time. As he was called upon merely to express an affirmative opinion, he should vote for the resolutions as amended; but the question was whether it was a subject upon which the Senate should be called to act. What was the use to be made of the question? If a negotiation were pending, it might exercise some influence; but in the present case, where that was precluded in language so strong by Lord Palmerston as to forbid the expectation of a resumption of the negotiation, he saw no utility in the adoption of the resolutions.

He thought a too frequent use of the expressions of opinions on subjects merely abstract, by a body of such high and grave authority as the Senate, would have a tendency to bring our opinions into disrepute.

Mr. CALHOUN said it was not his impression that there was much difference between the resolutions, as they originally stood, and as now amended. The chairman had showed him the amendments, before they had been acted on by the committee, and he had, without hesitation, assented to them; not because he thought them an improvement, but simply because he understood that some of the members of that committee desired the change. He looked only to the substance and the conclusion, and cared but little about the mere phraseology. It was a point of too little importance to dwell on. He must say, that he had heard the remarks of the Senator with pain. He had hoped, on this occasion, to have his zealous support. He yet hoped to have his vote. The principle involved is one of profound interest, especially to the portion of the Union he represented; and it was on that conviction he had offered them. Looking to the future, it is impossible to say what may result from the grounds assumed by the British Minister. Viewed practically, it was a question of no small magnitude. Cases of the kind must be constantly occurring; unless, indeed, the increased hazard from this new danger should have the effect of closing the intercourse by sea between the Southern Atlantic ports and those of the Gulf, so far as our slave property is concerned. If to this be added the injury done to our citizens, in refusing compensation for property seized and detained contrary to justice and honesty, and the dangerous principle on which the refusal is placed, the Senator ought not to be surprised, or have any difficulty in accounting for the introduction of these resolutions.

He admits there would have been no impropriety in introducing them, had there been a pending negotiation; but thinks there is, because the British Minister had closed the door of negotiation. He (Mr. C.) took the very opposite view. Pending the negotiation, and before the decision was known, the propriety of a movement of the kind would, to say the least, be doubtful; but now that it has been made, and justice refused, silence would have been construed into an abandonment of the claim of our citizens, and an acquiescence in the dangerous principle on which it was rejected. It was to repel such inference, that he desired to take the sense of the Senate. If the resolutions should receive the vote of the body, it would keep alive the claim, and, what was still more important, rebut any inferred abandonment of the principle on which it rests. He hoped that it never would be surrendered. Justice was on our side, and if we cannot succeed in establishing it now, there is no reason why we may not hereafter. He trusted that the strong expression of opinion by the Senate, which he this day anticipated, would rouse an attention to the subject, that might lead to a happy termination of a controversy which could not be safely kept open. Be that as it may, it is our duty to maintain our ground. If we now yield—if the Senate should refuse to act on the resolutions, or vote them down, we surrender both right and principle.

He would appeal to the Senate, and ask if it is ready to say that the rights of the South to the great mass of its property, that which enters so deeply into their political and social institutions, and on the maintenance of which, not only their wealth and prosperity, but peace and safety depend, shall be outlawed and placed beyond the pale of protection? Is it prepared to distinguish between this and every other description of property, so as to leave this alone undefended? The British Minister acknowledges that compensation ought to be made for every other description, under similar circumstances, and places the distinction between this and others, on ground fatal to its existence, if it be admitted. Is she right? That is the question; and are you ready to say so, by your votes? If so, it is time we should know it; and if not, you should speak out plainly and distinctly.

He had not supposed that there was a member of the body that would be embarrassed by the resolutions; on the contrary, he had hoped that all would have been pleased with the opportunity, in a case so strong and clear, of recording their votes in our favor—to stand by us on this great question, in which we are particularly concerned, as we have stood by them on a recent occasion where they were.

It is a proud recollection for the South, that she never halted to count the cost or danger, when the interest of any portion of the Union, the most remote, called for defence. This is the first difficulty with Great Britain, in which we have been immediately interested. The war of the Revolution originated in causes much more Northern than Southern; and still more strikingly was that the case in the last war. Did we hesitate in either? No; the generous South, ever devoted to the liberty and honor of the country, and true to its engagements, poured out freely her means, in blood and money, for the common cause, without asking whether she was to be the gainer or loser. What he asked, was, that the same zealous and ardent support that we have extended to other portions of the Union, should now be extended to us on this occasion.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky observed that he would not have advised the introduction of the resolutions, though there was not a man in the Senate or the country more ready to defend our rights by all the means which God and nature had given us, in reference to that particular species of property which the Senator alluded to. He thought, however, that prudence and discretion should admonish us not too often to throw before the world questions in relation to it. Who could believe that Great Britain, because she has refused to make compensation for the slaves on board the wrecked vessel which her colonial authorities had liberated, would interrupt or interfere with our coasting trade? Who could believe that she would assail such a description of property as that on board that vessel? Let her show such a purpose, and, his word for it, there would be but one feeling on the subject throughout the whole country. But what would the Senator propose but war for the redress of this injury, since all negotiation on the subject was at an end? Was that such an open, undisguised attack upon us as to justify such a measure? A vessel, pursuing her voyage from Norfolk to Charleston, is cast away on one of the Bahama islands, and the slaves on board, having been brought up before the authorities there on a habeas corpus, are liberated. Here, whatever the British Government had done, was involuntary. She had not gone out of her way to attack us with regard to this description of property. If she had done so, the Senator from South Carolina would not be in advance of him in resisting her. But in this case, the vessel was cast away in a storm on one of the British islands, and the slaves on board having been liberated by the authorities of that island, on a habeas corpus, she will neither surrender them nor make compensation for them. Though there was a material difference between the resolution as it originally stood, and as it was now amended, yet, inasmuch as it contained truths, he should vote for it, though he regretted its introduction.

Mr. CALHOUN. He had said nothing that could justify the Senator in accusing him of imputing to the British Government hostile or improper motives, nor that could lead to the belief that there was danger she would seize our vessels at sea, with the view of liberating slaves on board. He did not suppose that she is about to turn buccanier, and plunder our coasting trade; but her decision will interdict nearly as effectually the intercourse by sea between one half of this Union and the other, as to the greatest and most valuable portion of the property of the South, as if she were to send out cruisers against it. The voyage was a most dangerous one. The Bahama group of islands extends for nearly two hundred miles along the eastward of Florida, at an average distance of not more than fifty miles, with a strong current, running many miles an hour, sweeping through it, and beset with dangers from innumerable shoals and keys. Through this dangerous channel, subject to storms, the vast intercourse between the Western and Atlantic cities passes by sea. Numberless wrecks occur annually. It was estimated many years ago, when the intercourse was far less, that the loss annually from that cause, was more than half a million of dollars. To this danger is now superadded, in the case of slave property, plunder by seizure and detention on the opposing and inhospitable shore; thus virtually interdicting to that extent, this, the greatest of all our thoroughfares. It is to repel the inference of acquiescence in a decision leading to such consequences, and resting on a principle still more dangerous, that he solicited the vote of the Senate.

Mr. PORTER said: Mr. PRESIDENT: I desire to do my duty in some form by recording a vote on these resolutions, and yet I am met by difficulties on both sides of the main question they present, which I frankly confess I am greatly embarrassed in attempting to surmount.

I look first to the necessity and expediency of this species of preliminary action by the Senate on a subject of this magnitude and delicacy, which proposes to declare, in advance, the principles of the law of nations as applicable to slave property, thrown, by the act of God, within the jurisdiction of a country where slavery does not exist; and having arrived at the conclusion that such action is not expedient or necessary, I look, secondly, to the consequences which, in my humble judgment, necessarily result from the adoption of these resolutions, and which are by no means agreeable subjects of contemplation to me. These consequences I regard, sir, with an eye to the national honor only, which, in my view, cannot remain unsullied while the principle, as it is stated and applied in the last resolution, remains a silent record on your journal, unasserted, unvindicated, unacknowledged, unliquidated, by the demand and payment to the uttermost farthing of the sum claimed for the slave property on board the Enterprise, driven into the island of Bermuda.

From the reading of the documents accompanying the special message of the President of the 25th January last, consisting of the correspondence between Mr. Stevenson and Lord Palmerston, which was terminated by an adjustment, on the part of the British Government, of the claims for slaves wrecked on the Bahamas, on board the brigs Comet and Encomium, we are informed that the British Government has already refused to make compention in the case of the Enterprise, on the ground that the latter vessel was thrown within British jurisdiction after the period when slavery was abolished throughout the British dominions, which objection was not applicable to the cases of the two former vessels.

In the correspondence alluded to (of a regular diplomatic character) between the representatives of the two Governments, we find this principle distinctly and emphatically stated; and it is in the very teeth of this quasi ultimatum of the British Government on the question, and in reference to this very case of the Enterprise, that the last of these resolutions stands. Sir, I may mistake the effect which necessarily results from its adoption; but to my mind it is a pledge to the claimants and to the world of a determination on the part of our Government, so far as this Senate is concerned, at least, to demand the adjustment of this already rejected claim. Viewed in this light, profound as my deference is for the great abilities and eminent attainments of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] so signally developed in his examination of this question, when these resolutions were before us for consideration previous to their reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I confess it is to my mind beset with doubt and difficulty.

The right of the British Government to abolish slavery in her colonies, is admitted. And what are the consequences of the exercise of that right to the liberated slave? Does it not place him under the protection of British laws, which give him the right, while he conforms to them, to demand, at all times, and under all circumstances, the enfranchisement of his person? And is not this right equally sacred and inviolable, whether he be an alien, a denizen, or a native? for I know of no principle which deprives him of one or the other of these designations, even in the case of those wrecked in the Enterprise. British courts are open to him—the remedy by habeas corpus, co-extensive with the range of British law, is his; and if it reaches him, it must liberate him.

The possession and enjoyment of every species of property is attended with its hazards. It is more or less exposed to destruction and loss, from the peculiarities that belong to it. The precarious tenure of slave property is peculiar to itself. It has vitality, volition; and more, a human intellect to guide it—to prompt it to flight—to put forth the moral and physical resources and powers of man for its own defence and safety, and to defy efforts at recapture. The loss of this species of property by flight is, to my knowledge, immense; and when it reaches within the limits of a foreign jurisdiction, pursuit not only ceases, but the demand of restitution is silent. What becomes, in this instance, then, of the principle of national comity which gives to the subject or citizen of one country the right to obtain, through the tribunals of another country, his property found there? I can give no answer, where the escape is to a British jurisdiction, other than to say it is lost in the privileges and immunities of the people of England, "whether aliens, denizens, or natives;" and I confess myself unable to discriminate between the right to demand restitution in such a case, and in that of the Enterprise, now before us, provided it appears that no act of violence has been committed by the British authorities, whereby this vessel was brought into Port Hamilton. If it be the act of Providence which enables the slave to plant his foot on a soil which liberates him in the one case, so it is in the other; and he is alike, in my judgment, property, subject to recapture and right of control or not, as much in the one as in the other, and no more.

But it is said, in the language of the first of these resolutions, "that a ship or vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, is, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs, as much as if constituting a part of its own domain." This is true, in so far as the vessel, persons on board, and cargo, are subject, properly, to admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; but I apprehend it is no farther "exclusive." Common law rights, existing or arising on the high seas, either in respect to persons or property, are cognizable in the English common law courts, wherever they may be found; and I cannot conceive that any other strictly civil injuries can arise there, than such as are of a transitory nature, in respect to jurisdiction.

Is not personal liberty a common law, as well as a natural right, and does it not attach to every human being falling within the cognizance of British laws? When a British statute liberates a negro slave, does not the panoply of the common law cover him? And is the British Government prepared to admit, in violation of one of its most cherished maxims for ages, that this law is, in any of its features, in contravention of the law of nations.

Mr. President, it is from no spirit of fanatic zeal in the cause of negro emancipation, as it is now sought to be promoted in this country, by private conventional means, that I make these suggestions. The Constitution and laws under which we live, give unquestioned protection to the enjoyment of this species of property; and while the mutual obligations which bind together this confederacy of States exist as they now do, I will be one of the last to interfere with it, either in its possession or in its recaption, where the right by law to recaption is given. But it cannot be enjoyed without the limits of our own jurisdiction, and I am unwilling, in this form, to place the country in an attitude in which national honor will demand the assertion of this right of recaption elsewhere, and in a manner which may conflict with the local laws and jurisdiction of a foreign country. Slavery is a domestic institution with us, and all the principles of right in respect to it are well established and defined by the legislation of the States in which it prevails. There, under the guarantees of the Constitution of the United States, I wish to keep it. If it be an institution conferring benefits on the communities whose laws authorize it, be theirs the undisputed, unquestioned right to the enjoyment of their benefits. If it be an evil, the fact will sooner or later develope itself, and theirs, and theirs only, will be the remedy. But, in the present State of the civilized world, I confess I deprecate any agitation of this subject, not called for by the necessity of immediate action, calculated to make it the foundation of international controversy. The reasons I will not dwell upon—still less will I venture to speak of the consequences of a national war proceeding from such a ground of disagreement.

It also occurs to me, sir, (and I throw out the suggestion, as I have all others here advanced, with great diffidence,) that the adoption of these resolutions would be premature, inasmuch as there do not appear to have been any proceedings instituted in the courts of Bermuda resulting in a final judicial decision of the questions they present. If the principles they assume be sound here, they must be sound there, for they are derived from the international code, according to the doctrines contended for, and the courts of all civilized countries are bound by them. And if they be judicially inadmissible in respect to slave property in these courts, then the remedy is by legislation or negotiation; and here I fear we should be met, not only by obstacles founded in the very spirit of the British Constitution, but by others, equally formidable, arising from a natural repugnance of the British Government, to make the rights to slave property, exposed by casualty to the action of her tribunals, the subject of either, in the face of her recent policy of general emancipation.

For these reasons, erroneous though they may be, I join with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] in the expressions of regret that these resolutions have been presented for our action. I have not spoken to enlighten the Senate, for I am too conscious of my humble rank here to hope to do so, or with the expectation that I shall be sustained by a single voice; but merely to explain the difficulties under which I labor in my own mind, and in justification of the motion I now make, (thus going one step further than my distinguished friend) that these resolutions be laid on the table.

The question was then taken on Mr. P's motion to lay on the table, and it was decided in the negative—yea 1, nays 33, as follows:

YEA—Mr. Porter—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, and Young—33.

Mr. BENTON wished to say a word before the vote was taken. He wished to show that not only the citizens of Southern States, were interested in this matter, but also those of Western States, or those who wished to emigrate with their slaves to the West. Among the passengers in the Encomium, one of the vessels named in the debate on these resolutions, was Mr. Charles Allen, a citizen of Missouri, who was returning from a Southern State with a few valuable family slaves, which were taken from him by the authorities at Nassau. And although the owners of the other slaves have been compensated, Mr. Allen's claim has been disallowed, because the British Consul stated that the slaves departed with him. Mr. Allen made due proof of the loss of his slaves by the act of the British authorities; but, notwithstanding this, he has been notified that he will receive no compensation. This is an additional result of the principle avowed by the British Government, and an additional reason why we should pass these resolutions. The certificate of a consul, given in a case where he can hardly know any thing of his own knowledge, is to deprive an American citizen of his property, and to countervail all other testimony. In this way all claims may be defeated. The conduct of the British Government, Mr. B. said, was unjustifiable—a breach of the law of nations—and a wrong and indignity to the United States. She possesses islands lying in the Gulf of Mexico, in the very track of all our ships entering or departing from the gulf, and where tempests are frequent and shipwrecks frequent. If an American vessel, thus passing from one part of the United States to another, is driven by the tempest into any of these islands, and has slaves on board, the British Government declares them free! and, in the case where she has paid for some of those slaves, others are refused on a consul's certificate. This is unjustifiable, and we should so declare it.

The question then being taken, the resolutions were unanimously adopted, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, and Young—33.

NAYS—None.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, April 15, 1840.

Mr. STARKWEATHER, by permission, presented certain petitions from Robert Marshall.

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order was the reports of the Committee of Accounts, in relation to the contracts existing between Langtree and O'Sullivan with the Clerk of the House, for furnishing stationery, &c.; and the immediate question before the House was the motion to recommit the reports to the Committee on Accounts, with the following instructions:

1. Whether the prices paid by the CLERK of this House for stationery, is a reasonable price, when compared with what stationery can be purchased for from other persons of like quality.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior kind, when compared with the stationery purchased for this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. Whether any allowance was asked by the CLERK, either in writing or verbally, for the difference in exchange between Philadelphia and New York; and, if any, how much?

4. Whether any payment has been made by the CLERK to the contractor, in advance, on his contract, or the auditing of his account by the committee?

After a few words from Messrs. JOHNSTON of New York and JAMES GARLAND,

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York obtained the floor, and moved the following as a substitute for the above instructions, viz:

Strike out all after the word "moved," in the first line, and insert the following:

That the resolution which passed this House on the 4th day of March last, upon the subject of stationery, and the reports thereon, and the other matters therein contained, be committed to a select committee, with additional instructions to inquire and report to the House:

1. Whether the prices paid by the Clerk of this House for stationery are reasonable, when compared with prices for which stationery of the same quality could have been purchased of other persons than those of whom he purchased.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior quality, when compared with the stationery furnished this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. In what mode or manner the Clerk has advanced or paid money to said Langtree, in relation to said stationery, the amounts paid, and the different times when paid; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York said he was willing that both reports should be printed, and take their ordinary course in the House. Gentlemen would see the inconsistency, the impropriety, and the illiberality, of recommitting the report to the same committee, who had had the matter under consideration for seven weeks, and had presented to the House the only result at which they were able to arrive. The power to send for persons and papers was given to the committee, so that all doubt might be dispelled in relation to the subject, and to prove the facts required by the resolution under which the committee had acted. Mr. J. did not conceive that the duties of the committee had been properly discharged, as they had refused to receive evidence, in subversion of the resolution. The design of the mover of it had fallen to the ground. Mr. J. did not propose to go into a discussion as to the merits of the two reports which had been submitted. When it should become necessary he would do so. He hoped if there was to be a reference of the subject, that the good sense of the House would see the propriety of sending it to a select committee, and not to the committee who had had it under consideration, there to remain seven weeks longer.

Mr. JOSEPH JOHNSON said he regretted that any thing should have occurred to make it necessary for him to impose himself on the patience of the House, even for a single moment. But standing in the relation he did, he considered it as due to himself and the majority of the committee, that he should make a very few remarks on the subject. Mr. J. then adverted to the circumstances under which the resolution of the 3d of March had been adopted, instructing the committee to make their report. It would be evident to all that the report was based on the instructions given by that resolution, and had been prepared after a patient and diligent investigation by the majority of the committee. He believed the report contained all the facts contemplated by the resolution, and he would ask those gentlemen who were in favor of a reference, to furnish the committee with something on which they could base their action. If any individual or individuals were to have charges preferred against them, let the committee have those charges laid before them, and he would pledge his word that the majority of the committee would not shrink from a full and rigid investigation. And he would embrace the opportunity to say, that if gentlemen contemplated making any charges against the Clerk of the House in relation to the manner in which he had contracted for stationery, etc. he Mr. J. was authorized by that officer to say that he was very anxious for an investigation into the manner in which he had performed his duties.

If the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania should succeed in their effort to refer this subject back again to the committee, without any new matter whereon to base their report, they might be assured that the committee would arrive at no other result.

But with reference to the CLERK of the House, the facts would appear that he had, in all his contracts, taken the utmost precaution to guard the interests of Government. With a view of showing this, he would send to the Clerk's table the two resolutions of 1815 and 1827, under which the CLERK had acted, and by which he had been governed in making the contracts.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. JOHNSON said it would be apparent to all, that, under those resolutions, the CLERK was invested with full power to make all the contracts he had entered into. Under the former resolution, power was given to that officer to make contracts for any portion of stationery that he might deem necessary; and under the latter, he was directed to furnish such stationery as he might think proper for the House of Representatives.

Now he, Mr. J. was no lawyer, nor would he undertake to enter into a legal debate before a hundred and fifty lawyers; but he was guided by common sense, and he would appeal to every member of the House whether the CLERK had not acted in accordance with the plain common sense meaning of the resolutions in question. In the resolution of 1827, the CLERK was directed to "furnish" stationery, etc. Now what was the meaning of the word "furnish?" Would gentlemen pretend to say that the word "furnish" implied that the CLERK should, with his own hands, and without the assistance of any other person, perform all the duties appertaining to his office? For instance; one of the duties was to compile a book. But would gentlemen require that the CLERK should actually go into the printing office and perform the work of a practical printer? Again; he was required to furnish fuel for the House; but would gentlemen insist that the CLERK should shoulder his axe, enter the forest, and become a wood-chopper?

He would advise the gentleman from New York to be a little careful before he made accusations against the CLERK, and to pause while he was seeking ground of censure with an avidity equal to the bloodhounds of Florida. He would tell the gentleman, however, that even the backwoodsmen were not to be despised, for he had known instances where backwoodsmen had become Senators, and many a wood-chopper had been appointed to places of trust and honor. He would also tell him him that he had known men inhabiting log cabins being aspirants for the first office in the gift of the people.

After some debate on a point of order,

Mr. JOHNSON alluded to the practice of the former Clerk in the purchase of stationery. He reminded gentlemen that for some eight or ten years previous to the last Congress, the Clerk had been in the habit of purchasing directly the stationery for the House. And what was the result? Why, said Mr. J. you fared infinitely worse. When the Committee on Accounts shall come to look, they will discover the startling fact, that now, in one of the committee rooms, is unavailable and useless stationery piled up to the amount of some twenty-five or twenty-six thousand dollars! This excess of stationery, under a resolution of the last Congress, had been sent to New York for the purpose of being sold; but when put up at auction, it was found that it would not fetch one-fourth the price it had cost; so it was returned, and most of it remains on hand to this day.

Now, with a knowledge of these facts, was it not the duty of the CLERK to adopt some other mode of furnishing the stationery so as to avoid this loss? Yes, it would be remembered that at the last session of Congress the CLERK was admonished to adopt some other means. He accordingly entered into a contract for the furnishing of stationery of the best quality, at a moderate price, with a proviso that all which should not come up to the strict terms of the contract, should be returned. But another objection was, that the CLERK had made a written contract. Now he would ask, was the CLERK to be blamed for having taken the precaution of procuring a written agreement? Was he to be blamed for doing that which was done by every prudent man in the management of his private affairs? It appeared, however, that the act which was esteemed a virtue in private life, was a startling offence when practised by an officer of the Government.

Mr. J. said he had had the honor of serving on the Committee on Accounts during the last two or three Congresses. He had associated there with gentlemen of all political parties. He had had the honor of associating there with his namesake from Maryland, and with the gentleman from Kentucky, who, as political partisans, disputed every inch of ground. But never, till the commencement of this Congress, had that hydra headed monster, "party," been permitted to enter the committee room of the Committee on Accounts. Until this Congress, he and his associates on that committee had looked above all party considerations, and, like good servants of the people, they had put shoulder to shoulder, and labored for the public interests, under no other feelings than those dictated by friendship. He would that he could say the same now; but he could not. He had been told that soon after the meeting of the House at the present session, that certain gentlemen, not members of the committee, had attempted to raise a select committee to inquire into this very matter; and that, too, at a time when the standing committees had had no opportunity of making a report. He asked whether such conduct was not an implied censure on the gentlemen composing the standing committees. He repeated that, soon after the commencement of the present session, certain gentlemen had resolutions in their drawers, the object of which was to take the matter out of the hands of the standing committee, and refer it to a select committee.

Now he would ask, whence arose all this feverish anxiety? Was he to believe that it was for the purpose of manufacturing political capital for the benefit of the Hero of Tippecanoe? or was it because one of the parties to the contract was the editor of the Democratic Review, a talented young man, who had shown his ability to defend the liberties of his country? or was it because that gentleman [Mr. GARLAND] there, sitting at the table, had, at the commencement of the session, displayed a Roman firmness, in refusing to qualify five gentlemen from New Jersey, claiming seats under the sanction of the broad seal of the Governor, and with certificates given in defiance of the expressed will of the people.

The morning hour having expired, Mr. J. suspended his remarks; when

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

1. Message from the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d March, requesting "the President to communicate to the House, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any demand made by the minister or other diplomatic representative of Spain in this country, of the surrender to him of the Africans taken in or belonging to the vessel called L'Amistad, and of all correspondence between this Government and the said minister or diplomatic representative, and with any other foreign Government or minister thereof, relating thereto; also, copies of all instructions from the Department of State to the District Attorney of the United States in the judicial district of Connecticut, and all reports of the said Department relating to that subject."

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

2. Message from the President of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of March last, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, in relation to the "seizure and condemnation, by the British authorities, during the year now last past, of certain American vessels engaged in the fisheries.

On motion of Mr. LOWELL, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

3. Communications from the War Department, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d ultimo, calling for "copies of all orders and instructions issued from the Department to any officer of the army, or to any agent of the Government, requiring his interference with the Cherokee Indians in the formation of a Government for the regulation of their own internal affairs, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or with any existing treaty; also, copies of all instructions to any officer or agent of the Government, prescribing any particular form of Government for the adoption of said Indians, and interdicting any other form."

On motion of Mr. BELL, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

4. Depositions in relation to the New Jersey election.

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. J. W. JONES called for the orders of the day; and moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. ADAMS reminded the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that there were two special orders to-day. The bill to prevent frauds on the revenue was made the special order for this day; and the gentleman had consented, previous to said order, to take it up. That gentleman was aware of its importance, and he (Mr. A.) hoped that he would, in accordance with the compromise he entered into on the occasion referred to, consent that it should be taken up.

Mr. JONES was aware of the importance of the bill to prevent frauds, and was as anxious as the gentleman from Mass. could be that there should be immediate action upon it. By the arrangement to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had referred, it was not intended that this bill should have precedence of the civil and diplomatic bill; on the contrary, a special exception was made. The early passage of the appropriation bill now before the House was of the utmost importance. Many claims were now falling due, for which no provision was made. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman from Massachusetts would perceive the importance of proceeding in the consideration of the bill now before the House, and agree to a further postponement of his special order for a few days, and he should then have his co-operation to forward the action on it.

Mr. ADAMS said he was aware that his special order could not take precedence of the bill now before the House. It has not even the privilege of being the order of the day until disposed of; but for this day alone. He had no doubt that the bill would cause some debate. Mr. A. said he would move to make it the special order of the day, after the bill now before the House was disposed of, to take precedence of all other business. But as he might expect to have opposition from a certain quarter in the House, if he should not exclude private bill and petition days, he would therefore move to make it the special order from the hour of one o'clock daily, (except Mondays, Fridays, and Saturdays,) until disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said if the gentleman from Massachusetts would move to make it the special order to take precedence of every thing until disposed of, he would consent.

Mr. ADAMS, though he considered the private bills of great importance, acquiesced.

The question being taken by tellers. (Messrs. CHAPMAN of Alabama, and DAVIES of Pennsylvania, acting as such,) the result was—ayes 67, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—ayes 95, nays 61.

So the House refused to make it the special order to take precedence of all other business.

Mr. ADAMS hoped it would be made the special order for some day. Mr. A. then moved that it be made the special order for every day except petition and private bill days.

Mr. JONES remarked that he could not see the end of the discussion on the bill, and the pressing character of the appropriation bills was such, that if they be postponed by a long discussion on this bill, the public service would suffer.

Mr. R. GARLAND inquired of the CHAIR whether it was proposed to make it take precedence of the special order on the subject of printing.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. R. GARLAND. Then I object.

Mr. JONES of Virginia hoped the motion to make it the special order would not prevail.

The question was then taken, and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. ADAMS then moved that it be made the special order of the day for one day only, after the passage of the appropriation bill now before the House.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to—ayes 110, nays 21.

Mr. DAVEE asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the House to present the following resolutions, recently adopted by the Legislature of Maine; which, on his motion, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

RESOLVES RELATING TO THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Resolved, That the patriotic enthusiasm with which several of our sister States the past year tendered us with their aid to repel a threatened foreign invasion, demand our grateful recollection; and whilst this spirit of self sacrifice and self devotion to the national honor pervades the Union, we cannot doubt that the integrity of our territory will be preserved.

Resolved, That the promptness and unanimity with which the last Congress, at the call of this State, placed at the disposal of the President, the arms and treasures of the nation for our defence, the firmness of the Executive in sustaining the action of this State, and repelling the charge of an infraction of the arrangement made with the British Lieutenant Governor in March last, and charging back upon the British Government the violation of that agreement—their decision in demanding the removal of the British troops now quartered upon the disputed territory as the only guarantee that they sincerely desire an amicable adjustment of the boundary question, afford us confident assurance that this State will not be compelled single handed to take up arms in defence of our territory and the national honor, and that the crisis is near when this question will be settled by the National Government, either by negotiation or by the ultimate resort.

Resolved, That unless the British Government, during the present session of Congress, make, or accept a distinct and satisfactory proposition for the immediate adjustment of the boundary question, it will be the duty of the General Government to take military possession of the disputed territory; and in the name of a sovereign State we call upon the National Government to fulfil its constitutional obligations to establish the line, which they have solemnly declared to be the true boundary, and to protect this State in extending her jurisdiction to the utmost limits of our territory.

Resolved, That we have a right to expect the General Government will extend to this member of the Union, by negotiation or by arms, the protection of her territorial rights, guaranteed by the Federal compact, and thus save her from the necessity of falling back upon her natural and reserved rights of self defence and self protection—rights which constitutions can neither give nor take away, but, should this confidence of a speedy crisis be disappointed, it will become the imperative duty of Maine to assume the defence of our State and national honor, and expel from our limits the British troops now quartered upon our territory.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward copies of these resolutions to the President and Heads of Departments, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, with a request to the latter to lay them before the respective bodies of which they are members; also to the Governors of the several States, with a request to lay them before their several Legislatures.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia,

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CASEY in the chair, and took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. OGLE, who was entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday, in defence of General Harrison, and abusive of Mr. Van Buren; and, before concluding, at the hour of five o'clock, gave way to

Mr. CARTER, who moved that the committee rise; and the question was taken by tellers, (Messrs. CHAPMAN of Alabama, and DAVIES of Pennsylvania, acting as such,) and resulted, ayes 69, noes 32: no quorum voted; when

The committee rose, and the SPEAKER having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that fact to the House. Then

Mr. CARTER moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were, yeas 70, nays 43. Accordingly

The House adjourned.

PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill supplementary to the "Act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands." The amendments reported by the Committee on the Public Lands having been agreed to,

Mr. NORVELL said that a number of petitions had been presented to the Senate from settlers on the public lands, stating that in consequence of the embarrassments of the times, they had been unable to avail themselves of the benefits of the existing pre-emption act. That act was to expire in June, by its own limitation. The petitioners ask for a longer time, to enable them to realize the beneficent provisions of the land. Besides, the present pre-emption act had, by general consent, worked well, both for the actual settlers and the public. He therefore asked leave to submit a new section, providing for the extension of the pre-emption act of the 22d of June, 1838, to the 22d of June, 1842.

The amendment was further discussed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, NORVELL, CRITTENDEN, and PRENTISS, who, at the conclusion of his remarks, proposed to amend the amendment by adding a provision making four months' occupancy previous to the passage of the bill, a condition of the right of pre-emption.

Mr. P's amendment was debated by Messrs. HUBBARD, WHITE, PRENTISS, NORVELL, MERRICK, SEVIER, KNIGHT, and KING; and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 13, noes 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Ruggles, White, and Williams—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wright, and Young—24.

The question was then taken on Mr. NORVELL's amendment; which was agreed to—yeas 25, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Ruggles, and Strange—11.

Mr. PRENTISS then moved to strike out the second section of the bill; which, after some remarks by Messrs. P. and CLAY of Alabama, was decided in the negative—ayes 10, noes 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, and Strange—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—22.

After some further discussion, in which Messrs. WALKER and PORTER participated, the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, which was decided in the affirmative—ayes 25, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Prentiss, Ruggles, and Strange—7.

The Senate then went into Executive session, and afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
THURSDAY, April 16, 1840.

Mr. LEET rose and said he begged leave to present two petitions for pensions, which he had had in his possession for some time, and he expressed a hope that the House would permit him to do so.

The SPEAKER said if no objections were made, the gentleman from Pennsylvania could present the petitions referred to.

Mr. BANKS said he would ask the same favor, though he did not object.

[Mr. LEET then presented the memorial of David McMullin, of Washington county, Pa. praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Also, the memorial of William Cain, of Washington county, Pa for a pension: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.]

By consent, petitions were then presented informally by Messrs. BANKS, JONES of New York, McKAY, HOFFMAN, HILL of Virginia, GARLAND of Louisiana, CRABB, ELY, WAGENER of New York, and GARLAND of Virginia.

[Mr. JONES of New York presented two petitions from inhabitants of Orange county, for the establishment of a post road from South Middletown, through State Hill, Well's Corner, Westtown, and Unionville, in said county, to Deckertown, Sussex county, New Jersey.]

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to this mode of presenting the petitions; some might be received which ought not to be received under the rules. The further presentation was in consequence arrested.

The SPEAKER, by consent, laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, enclosing a communication from the Secretary of State, giving information called for under the resolution of the House of the 9th March in relation to the tobacco trade. On motion of Mr. JENIFER, referred to the Select Committee heretofore raised on that subject.

Also, sundry depositions in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which, on motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Also, a message from the Executive, communicating a copy of convention entered into with the Mexican Republic by the United States, for the indemnification of citizens of the United States for spoliations committed by the Mexican Government, on the property of citizens of the United States: on motion of Mr. EVERETT, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a bill which he said he intended to offer as a substitute for the Sub-Treasury bill, when that bill should come up for consideration; which was ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order was the reports of the Committee of Accounts, in relation to the contracts existing between Langtree and O'Sullivan with the Clerk of the House, for furnishing stationery, &c. and the immediate question before the House was the motion to recommit the reports to the Committee on Accounts, with the following instructions:

1. Whether the prices paid by the CLERK of this House for stationery, is a reasonable price, when compared with what stationery can be purchased for from other persons of like quality.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferor kind, when compared with the stationery purchased for this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. Whether any allowance was asked by the CLERK, either in writing or verbally, for the difference in exchange between Philadelphia and New York; and, if any, how much?

4. Whether any payment has been made by the CLERK to the contractor, in advance, on his contract, or the auditing of his account by the committee?

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York moved the following as a substitute for the above instructions, viz:

That the resolution which passed this House on the fourth day of March last, upon the subject of stationery, and the reports thereon, and the other matters therein contained, be committed to a Select Committee, with additional instructions to inquire and report to the House:

1. Whether the prices paid by the Clerk of this House for stationery are reasonable, when compared with prices for which stationery of the same quality could have been purchased of other persons than those of whom he purchased.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior quality, when compared with the stationery furnished this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. In what mode or manner the Clerk has advanced or paid money to said Langtree, in relation to said stationery, the amounts paid, and the different times when paid; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. JOSEPH JOHNSON said that when, on yesterday, his remarks were suspended by the expiration of the morning hour, it was his intention to have replied in detail to the speeches of the gentlemen from New York. But on reflection, he was satisfied that no good could arise from a continuance of a discussion thus prematurely. With that understanding, therefore, he would merely observe that the motion to recommit the subject to the committee under general instructions, would be only asking the committee to report what they had already done.

As regarded the document accompanying the report of the committee, marked with the letter J. and which had given the gentlemen from New York [Mr. JOHNSTON] and Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] so much pain and labor, he had one word to say. He understood that upwards of eight pages of the report made by the gentleman from New York, were taken up in attempting to prove that this document had been smuggled into the committee room. Now he would call the attention of the House to the resolution read on yesterday, by which it would be seen that, with the exception of the solitary vote of the gentleman from New York, the document was received by the unanimous vote of the committee.

Mr. CHARLES JOHNSTON, the member alluded to, rose for the purpose of making some explanation.

Mr. JOSEPH JOHNSON hoped the gentleman from New York would permit him to proceed without interruption, as he had but a few words to say, and would conclude in a very few minutes. He would say, then, that the document, instead of being smuggled into the committee room, had been introduced at the instance of a majority of the committee—the gentleman from New York being the only member who voted against it, and who had generally stood alone on all questions in relation to this matter. That document was furnished by a sworn officer of the House, and if there was a single error in any of the statements made therein, he asked the gentleman from New York to lay his finger upon it, and point it out. That document was compiled from papers on file in the Treasury Department, and the country would thank the CLERK for furnishing the valuable information it contained. For his part he would say that, so far as his knowledge extended, he would certify that the CLERK had been governed, in all his transactions, by honorable motives. He would also undertake to say that the stationery furnished by the present officer had been furnished on terms at least equal to those on which stationery had been supplied before.

If the House should deem it proper to recommit the subject, and order an investigation into the conduct of the CLERK, the latter, he was authorized to say, would be very glad to have an opportunity of meeting those charges.

Yes, said Mr. J. the House may, if it chooses, appoint another select committee of investigation, with power to send for persons and papers. The members of the committee might, if they pleased, follow the example of the Swartwout Committee, and proceed to New York, at an expense of nineteen dollars and thirty-five cents per day for each individual, as will be seen by the account of that committee herewith presented:

House of Representatives, Dr.
To Select Committee on Defalcations:

Cash paid Astor House for sixteen and a half days' board of six members, viz: Messrs. Harlan, Wise, Smith, Curtis, Hopkins, Dawson, and Mr. Fendall, their clerk, (wines and liquors not included)	$400 10
Extra charge for fuel, rooms, lights, etc.	110 00
Paid messenger	6 44
Messrs. Owens, Foster, and Wagener's bill at American Hotel	210 00
Mileage, 500 miles, for nine members	1,800 00
Same for clerk	200 00
	$2,726 54

But this was not the only expense: the printing alone growing out of this investigation amounted to some eighteen thousand dollars, so far as he had ascertained.

They might, if they thought proper, lay another tax upon Government of $50,000, which had been paid for another committee of investigation, (that of 1837, of which Messrs. Wise and Peyton were members.)

Mr. J. concluded by opposing a recommitment of the report, unless additional and specific charges were made.

Mr. PETRIKIN went into an argument of some length, in support of the motion to recommit the report. In making the motion to recommit the reports, he acted as a party man, regardless of the denunciations of any man, or the sneers and taunts of some of the Clerk's friends, and their assertions that he was directing the party. He belonged to the Democratic party, and that party based all their political acts on certain fixed fundamental principles; and that one of those was strict accountability and responsibility of all public officers and agents. That the party he belonged to held that the officer who skulked or attempted to screen himself from such accountability, or he or they who attempted to aid others in such a course, was not one of us. He was aware, however, that all parties were like large armies. An army had crows and buzzards following and hovering over them, for the purpose of feasting on the carcasses left on their course. So it was with the Democratic party when in power; they had men hovering around the honest part of them, or even going in advance, not from principle or attachment to them, politically or individually, but for the plunder to be obtained; and of this they have striking examples every day. He came there as the representative of constituents whose wish was to remedy evils, wherever they existed, and to save the money of the country, without reference to any man—principles, not men, was the standing motto of the party he belonged to, and that he followed the lead of no man, except so far as that man aided in carrying into execution the principles he professed, and endeavored to practice. Now, in relation to this matter, he would say that he considered there had been a disposition shown by the CLERK to skulk from investigation. He had observed indications of a wish to shut the door against inquiry; and whenever a door was thus closed, it was very natural for people to infer that there was something not exactly right behind the door. He was, therefore, determined, so far as in him lay, to have a full and strict investigation into this matter, so that the true state of the case might be known. He thought it right to say that he had nothing personal against the CLERK, but was guided solely by public motives; and in the course of his political life, he believed he had never suffered private matters to interfere with his public duties.

Mr. P. then alluded to the resolutions for regulating the CLERK in the purchase of stationery, and contended that the latter, in his contracts with Mr. Langtree, had not acted in accordance with the instructions contained in those resolutions. He thought no gentleman ought to object to a recommitment of the whole matter. If they were conscious that the CLERK had done his duty, what reason had they to be afraid? He went into a history of the subject, with a view to show that the committee had not acted in accordance with the resolution referring the matter to it for investigation.

Mr. P. in reply to that part of the remarks in relation to the accumulation of paper, said, in justice to the late Clerk, (W. S. Franklin,) that, no damaged paper, or paper of any kind, had accumulated since 1835, except forty-eight reams, and that was not damaged, but of an inferior quality, which had remained on hand, because the person who had it had failed, and become insolvent before it could be returned, and that this fact he could prove.

Mr. WISE said that, after the misconduct, necessarily inferred from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he, as a member of the Virginia delegation, felt bound to demand for the CLERK a full and thorough investigation. He felt that the honor of the State which he represented, required him, as a personal, though not political friend of the CLERK, to give that gentleman an opportunity of meeting the charges made against him. But, until those charges should be proved, he was bound to presume him innocent. After what had transpired, he felt that the honor of his State would suffer, if any imputation were suffered to rest on the character of the CLERK.

Mr. W. said that he had, some time ago, presented to the House a communication addressed to him by a lithographer of this city. That communication was referred by the House to the committee, but had never been reported on. The individual alluded to was a practical lithographer and an eminent artist. He had conversed with him on the subject, and had been told by him that Mr. Langtree, to whom the CLERK had given the contract, had proposed that he, the artist, should do the work for one half the price charged the Government. The artist had also assured him, Mr. W. that he would willingly undertake to execute the work for one half the price charged by Mr. Langtree.

This artist was willing to come forward before the committee, and testify to the facts, whether they went to inculpate the Clerk or not. But, until the charges made against the latter were proven, he would not believe him guilty of any wilful or intentional dereliction from his duty. This was the ground he would take, and he felt confident that there was not one of his colleagues who would not agree with him.

Mr. W. said it appeared, from the remarks of the gentleman from New York, that the majority of the committee had refused to hear testimony, although the resolution of the House required them to send for persons and papers, and to take testimony. Now he contended that the evidence of the artist alluded to ought to have been taken, and reported to the House. He was not desirous of entering into a debate with his colleague as to the best manner of executing the work, whether by contract or not; but he thought the Clerk of the Senate ought to have been examined, with a view of showing how the business was managed in that body. He objected to the memorial furnished by the Clerk, which he contended the committee had substituted for a report.

Mr. W. was proceeding to propound some inquiries to his colleague, [Mr. J. JOHNSON,] when the SPEAKER admonished him that the morning hour had expired; when,

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and took up for consideration the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill; and

Mr. OGLE, who was still entitled to the floor on the above bill, went into a vindication of the vote of General Harrison in the Ohio Legislature to sell free white men into slavery, who were imprisoned as insolvent debtors, and were unable to pay costs. He cited the penal laws of several States, under which vagrants and thieves are either sold into slavery or whipped, as an evidence that such an act as was proposed to be passed by the Ohio Legislature was not unprecedented. He argued that it was no more an act of slavery to sell out of prison into servitude, than it was to incarcerate in prison on low diet; but, on the contrary, that it was more humane. He entered into a defence of the military and civil services of General Harrison; gave a description of his furniture and cooking utensils, and presented a graphic picture of the exterior appearance of his dwelling, as well as its general interior arrangement, to show his fitness for the Presidency. In the course of his remarks, he charged that the President had practised the greatest extravagance in the purchase of furniture for the President's house.

Mr. LINCOLN said, were it not for the situation he was placed in reference to the committees, he would not press himself upon the attention of the committee at the present time. It seemed that after seven days consumed in this debate, it was about time to inquire what had resulted from the deliberations of the committee. They were the faithful representatives and servants of the people; and he said, whether Gen. Harrison was a fit person for the Presidency or not; whether he should be elected to to that office or not; whether he was an Abolitionist or not; whether he was a hero, and entitled to the confidence of the people, or unworthy of their confidence, could not affect this bill. This appropriation bill must be passed; for one, he would say that he would vote for it, whatever might be the condition or disposition of the Presidential question. He would vote for it; but before doing so, he should endeavor to make it as free from objections as possible. The Government must have means to carry on its operations. He presumed that there was no gentleman in that House who would take upon himself the responsibility of withholding such means as were necessary for that purpose. It was to pass in some shape or other, and he felt bound, from a conviction on his mind of a sense of duty and patriotism, to pass this bill as speedily as possible. There will be other occasions on which debates of the character which had taken place on this bill, and which had amused and instructed us, and instructed the nation, will be more in place, and the time would be more ample, and attended with less prejudice to the public service.

Mr. L. thought it high time that some limitation were made to the strange latitude of debate in which gentlemen had thought proper to indulge for the last few days. For his part, he did not feel authorized, on a subject like the present, to take up and discuss the merits of General Harrison, although perhaps, on a proper occasion, it would be found that he was as able to undertake that task as some others.

Mr. L. then alluded to his political relations with the other four member on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, when it so happened that he was placed single handed to represent the Whigs. Whether it was his misfortune or his fault he would not say; but it was a fact that, on all measures in relation to business, (for politics were out of the question,) he invariably concurred in the opinions of those gentlemen. If, in the present instance, they had done wrong, he was also to blame, for he had concurred with them in recommending the appropriation. If any thing exceptionable had come from the committee, and had been introduced into the general appropriation bill, he felt himself bound, in honor, to take his share of the reproach. He would consider it mean and cowardly, when his political opponents on the committee were attacked, for him to attempt to escape from censure, when he was conscious that he himself had acted with them. He mentioned that as matter of little consequence; but he felt bound, whoever might be the accuser, to stand up and do his associates on the committee justice.

He regretted to see that, in relation to some items of the bill, there had been some strange misapprehensions, and more particularly by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COLE.] He understood the gentleman objected to the item of $3,665 for alterations and repairs to the President's House. Now, it would be found that this sum was made up of a number of small items, all of which were perfectly reasonable. But he would tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that his attack on such matters was a very small business indeed, and before he should conclude, he would point out to that gentleman much higher game, if he felt disposed to pursue it.

In the first place, the gentleman had entirely misapprehended the character of the item of appropriation to which he objected. The aggregate amount consisted of many small items, and he felt confident that when the gentleman understood how that aggregate amount was made up, he would no longer object to it, or deem it so very extravagant.

One of these items was, "for the annual repairs of the President's House and furniture, $500." Now, said Mr. L. I would ask whose duty it is to do this? Was the President at liberty to do it? What tenant, having a lease of a house, could by law make alterations? And could the President make alterations in a house, of which he was the occupant for four years only? Had he a right to do this, even were he disposed to do it at his own expense? No: it was the duty of the Government, who first built the house, to keep it in repair, and shelter its occupant from the rain and winds of heaven. Did not Government build the house for the accommodation of its presiding officer? and would that Government be justified in permitting it to fall to pieces, and go to ruin, for want of a small appropriation to keep it in repair? This sum of $500, he would tell the gentleman, was exclusively for repairs to the house, the word "furniture" having been inserted merely as a matter of form, observed in all former appropriations. The money was not intended to purchase a single article of furniture, but was exclusively for the house; and he would appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any other gentleman, whether an appropriation of $500 for repairs to a house that cost a million, was not a very moderate sum?

Besides, if General Harrison was to occupy the house, and he trusted that would soon be the case, it ought to be kept in good condition. For his part, he was not willing that Gen. Harrison should enter a house in a dilapidated condition. He wished to have it, at least, provided with the necessary articles of furniture, such, for instance, as a few chairs to sit upon, for the accommodation of visiters and private individuals.

Another item composing the aggregate amount, was for the service of a gardener, $150; here this man was employed to attend to the public gardens and grounds adjoining the President's House, and was in fact attending to the business of Government; for who would undertake to say that those gardens were of any benefit to the President? They were open to the public, and belonged to the people, and were kept in order more for the gratification of members of Congress than for the occupant of the White House.

Mr. L. then alluded to another item for the payment of a few laborers at $1 per day, and asked if it was likely the President would hire these laborers for his own convenience. Certainly not. Besides, what would be the consequence if they should refuse to make this small appropriation? Why, the result would be that those beautiful mounds and other contrivances, made not for the gratification of the President, but to please the public eye, would be neglected. This money was to keep in repair the walks frequented by the public, and he, with others, had often visited them; and would any gentleman contend that the President himself was bound to keep them in repair, when they were for the accommodation of the people at large? No, the gardens and grounds were the property of the people, and the people expected that the labor expended on them should be paid for. He would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, what difference there was between the public grounds around the President's House, and the public grounds and gardens of the Capitol. No objection was made to the paying of laborers on the latter, and why should there be any with respect to the former? They were alike accessible to, and for the gratification of, the public.

Another item was for horse and cart hire for the public squares attached to the President's House. How would any one undertake to say that the President had any thing to do with the enclosing of these two squares? The grounds had not been enclosed for his accommodation. But he (Mr. L.) did not attach so much importance to these small items; it was the principle involved for which he was contending. The very same objections to these items would, on this principle, apply to appropriations of greater amount, and to nearly every other item in the bill. It would also apply to any other appropriations which might be recommended by the Committee on the Public Buildings.

It had always been customary for the Committee on the Public Buildings to investigate the requisite appropriations, and then transfer them to the Committee of Ways and Means. The present appropriation had come to the Committee of Ways and Means in that manner.

He would ask whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania could assign any reason why this appropriation should not be made. Was it inconsistent with the genius of a Republican Government that the house of its President should be kept in repair, and provided with the conveniences of a private dwelling?

He would submit whether the original Representatives of the people, when they constructed that palace, designed that it should fall to decay, and become a reproach to the nation, by its dilapidated condition. When our forefathers erected that House, and ordained that it should be the habitation of their presiding officer, did they intend that the walls should tumble to ruins, and the rain and the storm beat in, for want of a small appropriation to keep it in repair? No man in his senses would think of such a thing. When our ancestors constructed that building, they contemplated it for the convenience of its occupant, and they surely never expected an appropriation would be objected to for keeping it in proper order.

Would gentlemen now be understood as objecting to provide proper furniture, and such as was appropriate to the mansion? If they intended, however, that their President should live in a cabin, then he would readily admit that a great portion of the present furniture would be unnecessary and inappropriate to such a dwelling. He would like to know if gentlemen had in contemplation the removal of this President and the one who was to follow, into any other mansion. If so, why then a very small amount would be required, as a cabin would incur but little expense. But if it were intended that the President of this great nation should still occupy the mansion built and intended for him by our forefathers, who won their rights by toil and blood, why, then, object to furnishing it in a decent manner, and in a manner, too, in keeping with the size of the building itself? For the actual personal convenience of the President, he was sure a very little was desired; but the occupant of the house, our highest Executive officer, while there, was the personification of the people, whose dignity required that every thing should be kept in proper order. If the President's personal wants alone were the question, why he, Mr. L. supposed, that, as a mere matter of utility, a small one dollar looking-glass would do just as well as a large swing mirror. But who would say that the mansion of the President of the American people—an officer elected for a term of four years as the representative of a glorious and proud Republic, embracing more than fifteen millions of freemen—should live in a large house, furnished no better than a log cabin? How paltry would it look, and what a miserable idea of economy would it give to agents and ministers from foreign countries, when they beheld a paltry one dollar looking-glass hung up in a building of dimension equal to the palaces of Europe? The idea was too ridiculous to be entertained for a moment, and yet, by the principles on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been arguing, this course must be pursued.

Because our Government was a Republic, was that any reason why the head of it should not live and appear with a proper dignity, becoming the pride and strength of the people over whom he presided? In his humble opinion, the President of a country like ours had as good a right, yes, a much greater right, to be as proud as the proudest monarch on the face of the globe. And he, Mr. L. would blush and be ashamed if the President should not have it in his power to receive ministers and visiters from foreign powers in a becoming way, in a mansion furnished in keeping with the dignity of a great nation. He was sure there was no harm to be apprehended from a course of this kind, and that no bad consequences would result from it.

But he wished to know who it was that had complained of the President's House being too well furnished? It had been visited by hundreds and thousands of farmers and mechanics, people by whose vote he had been elected, and had they ever uttered a complaint and said that the President of their choice had too much, or too costly furniture? No. He, Mr. L. would undertake to say that no member had ever heard such complaints, that the furniture was too rich or too good for the man whom they had placed in that high and honorable station. And if the people, who, by thousands, have visited and witnessed for themselves, make no complaint, what right had any one else? It would be quite time enough for that, when the people themselves were dissatisfied.

Mr. L. then complained of the many extravagant stories which had gone through the country in relation to the furniture of the President's House. The people had been informed of things which had no existence, except in the imagination of those who originated such groundless stories. He then referred to the similar charges made against his venerable colleague [Mr. ADAMS] while that gentleman occupied the house. The country was at that time made to believe the house was furnished in a costly and extravagant manner, when in fact it had scarcely any furniture at all. The things were not there which ought to have been there; and those who knew no better, supposed that Mr. ADAMS was enjoying things which he ought to have, but did not enjoy. At that time, it was obvious that such stories were circulated for political effect; and was not this the case in the present instance? In his opinion very little could be gained by such a course. It was a very small business, especially when much higher ground could be taken, and attacks made on much more important objects. He would cry shame on the man who would represent that extravagance existed in the President's mansion, when in fact there was scarcely any furniture at all. The furniture was now what it ought to have been in the time of Mr. Adams, and now it was no better than it should be.

Mr. L. said, that so far was he from considering the house as too well furnished, that he had actually reported a bill for increasing the furniture It was not contained in the present appropriation, but was a distinct bill, which he would ask might be considered at a proper time. In that bill the Committee on Public Buildings proposed giving the President $700 to increase the furniture. The $500 in the present bill did not apply to the furniture, but exclusively to repairs for the house.

Would gentlemen ask what part of the House they intended to furnish? He would tell them. What was the state of the receiving room? There was not a mirror, even a common seven-by-nine mirror, in it; there was not a single table, except an old pine table in one corner, which, under the hammer of the auctioneer, would not fetch seventy-five cents, and an old worn out sofa The whole lot would not fetch $5; and yet this was the ante-room into which foreign ministers, and visiters of every description, were introduced to see the President. Now what did the committee intend to do with the $700? They did not intend to furnish the house like a palace, but to supply it with good, simple, and substantial furniture, of home manufacture. They designed the purchase of good, substantial chairs, for the accommodation of visiters, and of gentlemen when accompanied by ladies; and it was but reasonable to suppose that most ladies, before being introduced to the President, would be desirous of adjusting their bonnets, etc. (laughter.) Therefore, the committee designed to purchase a plain mirror, of suitable dimensions.

The committee thought that an ante-room for the reception of foreign ministers, with its common chair and old cast-away sofa, was hardly the proper thing, or consistent with the dignity of the American people. It might be said, however, that what the committee proposed doing was not Democratic, nor in accordance with the principles of our Republic. Such was not his opinion. On the contrary, he held that it was Democratic to supply the President with necessary furniture, and conveniences for the house in which they had appointed him to live.

[Mr. L. here made some allusion to his own political career, which was not distinctly heard.]

He maintained that the supplying of proper furniture to the White House could have no anti-Republican tendency. He held that it was consistent with the purest Republicanism to keep the house in repair, so that it might be fit for the reception of General Harrison when he should take possession of it.

Mr. L then addressed himself to the chairman, [Mr. CASEY,] and said: Sir, I wonder if the occupancy of that chair for the last few days, with its crimson drapery and other appendages, has had any tendency to affect your Democratic and Republican principles. You have the crimson curtains hanging over your head, and you are elevated above us all, and yet I cannot conceive for a moment that it has affected your principles, or done you any harm. So far as my observation has extended, your occupancy of that high seat for the last six or seven days, has made no alteration in your demeanor, or in your usual courtesy and gentlemanly demeanor to your fellow members. No, I do not believe that the trimmings of that chair have affected your mind, or made any alteration in your Democratic and Republican sentiments, let them be what they may.

Mr. L. then alluded to the circumstances under which the curtains and other appendages around the chair had been placed there; and he took that opportunity of saying, that if there was any objection to them, he was responsible for it, inasmuch as he, as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings, had reported the appropriation for it. It was true, the late Speaker had the direction of it, so that the chair might be in keeping with the rest of the House; but he (Mr. L.) was responsible, as he had made the report recommending the appropriation. If it was proper to have a splendid dome on the Capitol, it was also proper to have every other portion of the building in keeping with it. As it has been determined to have mahogany desks, mahogany chairs, with cushions, for members, he would ask whether it would be in keeping with the other parts of the hall, to put an indifferent pine table in front of the chair. He was sure no gentleman would contend that it would. They would all agree that it was necessary to have one portion of the hall in keeping with another. Now the same principle which applied to the chair and to this Capitol, would also apply to the President's House. If the furniture and appendages of either were considered too costly, it was not the fault of members, or of the President. If, said Mr. L. any body is to be blamed, it must be your ancestors—those patriots who thought proper to construct such buildings. If gentlemen felt disposed to throw stones, they must throw them at their patriotic forefathers, who in the purity and simplicity of their hearts, did not deem such buildings too costly, or as having an anti-Republican tendency. We had not done it. It had been in generations gone by, and by men better than we were; and he who would undertake to deny an appropriation for keeping such buildings in repair, was casting a reproach upon the memory of those good men. He would again repeat, that opposing such appropriations was a small business, very small indeed, and which would do no man any credit. There were objects of a far higher character to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania might direct his attention, and where the Administration was more vulnerable.

He, Mr. L. was no friend of Mr. Van Buren, but he would do him the justice to say that, if there was any thing wrong in relation to the furniture of the White House, the President was not to blame for it. On the contrary, he, Mr. L. knew his great delicacy on the subject, and would assure gentlemen that, whenever the committee had consulted the President in relation to any additional furniture, he had invariably expressed the greatest reluctance to have any thing expended for that object. He, Mr. L. would state, from his own knowledge, that not a single article of furniture supplied during the last three years, had been supplied at the request of the President himself. The committee alone were answerable, and they would assume the responsibility. But so far was the President from desiring any additions made to the furniture, that, about two years ago, it actually became necessary for himself and the other members of the committee to do what he had never done before, nor would he ever do it again. Did gentlemen wish to know what that was? He would tell them. It was to go through every room in another man's house, to see how much furniture he wanted, and what conveniences were required. He hoped that gentlemen would take notice of this fact, and remember it whenever they attempted to cast censure on the President in relation to his furniture.

Mr. L. then gave some particulars of the condition of the White House, when it was visited by the committee, before it was left by the late President Jackson.

He said there was one room occupied by the Private Secretary of the President, with his wife and family. In that room there were three old chairs, a stained washstand, and a shabby old-fashioned mahogany table, which turned up, and which was so mean that the wagoner of President Monroe was ashamed of it, and actually refused to take it away. When he looked round that room, it reminded him of his son's college room. Yet these three old chairs, stained washstand, and turn up table, was all the furniture in that room, which was occupied by the Private Secretary and family up to the time the late President left the city. If any gentleman doubted the truth of this statement, let him go through the chambers and inspect them himself. But he hoped he should no longer hear blame cast on the President when a small appropriation was required for the purchase of necessary furniture. If the furniture was considered too expensive, it was not the fault of the President, but the fault of those who, by constructing the building of such dimensions, had rendered it necessary.

Mr. L. expressed his determination to vote for every reasonable appropriation for keeping the house in proper repair. He then called attention to the sums expended on the Treasury building, and went into an argument of some length to show that, in this instance, the appropriations had really been abused; which remarks will be given as early as time and circumstances will permit. Mr. L. having concluded,

Mr. PETRIKIN obtained the floor, and intimated a desire to reply to that portion of the remarks of Mr. LINCOLN in relation to the construction of the Treasury, Patent, and Post Office buildings; and, on his motion, the committee, at 6 o'clock, rose, and reported progress.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 17, 1840.

Mr. DOTY asked the consent of the House to offer a resolution, proposing to authorize the CLERK to have printed a certain map of Wiskonsin; but the reception of the resolution was objected to

By universal consent, Messrs. STEENROD and REYNOLDS presented petitions.

[Mr. REYNOLDS of Illinois presented the memorial of George Kender, Joel Whiteside, and Jubilee Posey, of Madison county, Illinois, praying the adjustment of certain land claims; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.]

Mr. BURKE asked the general consent of the House to present a memorial.

Mr. RARIDEN objected.

Mr. LEET said his friend from Indiana [Mr. RARIDEN] certainly would not object if he knew the nature of the memorial, it being one from the CLERK of the House in relation to the subject pending before the House.

Mr. RARIDEN was understood to withdraw his objection.

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order was the reports of the Committee of Accounts, in relation to the contracts existing between Langtree and O'Sullivan with the CLERK of the House, for furnishing stationery, &c. and the immediate question before the House was the motion to recommit the reports to the Committee on Accounts, with the following instructions:

1. Whether the prices paid by the CLERK of this House for stationery, is a reasonable price, when compared with what stationery can be purchased for from other persons, of like quality.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior kind, when compared with the stationery purchased for this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. Whether any allowance was asked by the CLERK, either in writing or verbally, for the difference in exchange between Philadelphia and New York; and, if any, how much?

4. Whether any payment has been made by the CLERK the contractor, in advance, on his contract, or the auditing of his account by the committee?

Mr JOHNSTON of New York moved the following as a substitute for the above instructions, viz:

That the resolution which passed this House on the fourth day of March last, upon the subject of stationery, and the reports thereon, and the other matters therein contained, be committed to a Select Committee, with additional instructions to inquire and report to the House:

1. Whether the prices paid by the CLERK of this House for stationery as reasonable, when compared with prices for which stationery of the same quality could have been purchased of other persons than those of whom he purchased.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior quality, when compared with the stationery furnished this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. In what mode or manner the CLERK has advanced or paid money to said Langtree, in relation to said stationery, the amounts paid, and the different times when paid; and that said committee have power to send for person and papers.

Mr. BURKE then asked leave to present the memorial of Mr. GARLAND, the Clerk of the House.

Mr. WISE claimed his right to the floor on the question before the House. He would, however, like to hear the memorial read.

The memorial was then presented and read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: As an officer of your honorable body, deprived by the rules of the House, and the laws of propriety, from appearing in my own defence, I am constrained to resort to the ultimate right of an American citizen, and appeal to your honorable body, praying that a Select Committee may be raised, and inquiry made into my official conduct, the propriety and integrity of which have been brought in question.

In a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, two days since, when this matter was brought into the House, I stated to him that I had no hing to conceal, was anxious for the most rigid scrutiny, and hoped he would throw no obstacle in the way of investigation. This letter he was author zed to read to the House, if nec s'ary; and he did, in his speech, state the substance thereof. But I understand that it was again repeated yesterday, (I was not present,) that I have acted fraudulently, and am endeavoring to screen myself from investigation.

There were sufficient facts before the committee to disprove this charge, and there is now in the report of the committee, lying on your table, sufficient evidence to refute all such gratuitous assertions; but that there may not be the slightest doubt resting on the matter, I pray your honorable body to give the fullest scope to investigation. In asking for a Select Committee for this purpose, I only mean to respond to the wishes of those who expressed a desire for further inquiry, and not to cast any imputation on the Committee of Accounts, who have hitherto had this matter in charge, and have reported thereon. But as they are accused of a partial leaning in my favor, I hope I shall be excused in desiring that any future investigation may be tranferred to another tribunal. I have no choice as to that tribunal. I throw myself upon the whole House, without regard to party distinctions, without fear of party influences, not doubting that a fair and honorable trial will be awarded me. I ask no favors—only justice.

Very respectfully,

HUGH A. GARLAND,

Clerk House of Representatives U. S.

Mr. BURKE said he wished to have a Select Committee raised on the memorial, with general instructions

The CHAIR inquired what number did the gentleman propose the committee should consist of.

Mr. BURKE replied five.

The CHAIR said there was such a proposition now before the House.

Mr. WISE presumed that that proposition would answer.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said that the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHNSTON] was specific, and that of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURKE] was general in its character.

Mr. WISE said he highly approved of the course of the CLERK in demanding an investigation. He was sure there was no one who did not desire that the investigation should be accorded to the CLERK upon what was charged. He said he always was in favor of ordering investigations into the conduct of the public officers on the principle of law which presumed all criminals innocent until they be proved guilty. It was for that reason that he was opposed to the doctrine that the conduct of a public officer could not be investigated except on specific charges. The true ground, as the basis of all investigations, was the presumption of the innocence of the public officer, and for that reason he was in favor of general, and not specific, powers to a committee of investigation in this instance. The CLERK had done in this instance what every public officer should do. The disposition which had heretofore been pursued, to obstruct investigation except specific charges were preferred, would not be tolerated in a country like this. The doctrine of specific charges was wholly erroneous. There should be, and could be, no specific charges, unless there was data to go upon; but he held that when the least suspicious were hinted, in the public prints even, that the officers of the Government should come forward, as the CLERK had done in this instance, and demanded that an investigation should be had, and that witnesses should be examined on oath. The CLERK did what was right and proper; and he thought it was just that his memorial, and the reports of the minority and majority of the committee, and the statements of the CLERK accompanying these reports, should be referred to the Select Committee proposed, with general instructions to inquire into all matters of fraud and economy—the economy of the contract, and the fraud, if any, in making the contract. This embraced every thing which it was proposed to investigate.

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York made no objection which was distinctly heard; when

Mr. WISE inquired of him whether the grounds he had taken would not embrace every thing that he wished.

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York was understood to say that the resolution of March was in terms sufficiently broad to embrace every thing, if the committee had acted in good faith under it.

Mr. WISE then read a resolution proposing to raise a Select Committee, with general powers; which Mr. JOHNSTON of New York accepted as a modification of his.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia hoped his colleague would agree to receive the memorial, and have it referred.

Mr. WISE was perfectly willing that it should be.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS objected to its reception.

Mr. LEET contended that the memorial had been already received.

Mr. J. GARLAND moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of receiving it; and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were, yeas 132, nays 13. Those who voted against its reception were,

Messrs. Andrews, Barnard, Calhoun of Massachusetts, Cranston, Garret Davis, Dennis, Dillet, Gentry, Hall, Mitchell, Proffit, John White, L. Williams, and C. H. Williams.

So the memorial was received.

Mr. BURKE then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorial of HUGH A. GARLAND, Clerk of the House of Representatives, relating to his official conduct as an officer of this House, be referred to a Select Committee of five members, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. PETRIKIN here raised a point of order, the rules having been suspended for a specific object—the reception of the memorial—whether it was in order to offer a resolution.

The CHAIR decided that the resolution was in order.

Mr. PETRIKIN took an appeal from that decision.

Mr. CLIFFORD maintained that the resolution was certainly in order—the rules having been suspended for the purpose of receiving the memorial—and the memorial itself called for the appointment of a Select Committee. It would be no use to receive it, unless for the purpose of having some action upon it.

Mr. JAMES GARLAND, for the purpose of doing away with any cavil, or any objection, and to show that the CLERK was willing to meet the investigation in its broadest sense, would submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorial of the CLERK, and all other papers and matters pertinent to the subject, now before the House, from the Committee of Accounts, or from any other source, be referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to inquire into all matters of fraud, all considerations of economy, and all other matters and things in relation to the contracts made by the CLERK of this House, in relation to furnishing stationery and lithographic printing for the House; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BURKE accepted it as a modification of his resolution.

Some objection being still expressed,

Mr. J. GARLAND said he did not wish to appear captious about the form, and that the gentleman objecting might put the resolution in his own form.

Mr. WISE said the resolution, as then proposed, embraced all that was requisite.

Mr. PETRIKIN still persisted in his point of order, that the rules were not suspended for any disposition of the memorial, or for the reception of any resolution.

The CHAIR said that the rules having been suspended for the reception of the memorial which asked for a particular thing, it was certainly in order for the House to have any proposition on the memorial to effect that object.

Mr. PETRIKIN, to save trouble, said he would so modify his proposition as to refer the whole subject under the instructions to a Select Committee.

Mr. LEET said he had risen for the purpose of expressing his entire satisfaction with the course which the House, by its vote, on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] to suspend the rules, indicated a disposition to pursue, in reference to the memorial of the CLERK, which was a few minutes ago read at the desk.

He thought that it was right and proper, to receive and act upon that memorial, and with that view he had voted for a suspension of the rules. Under the circumstances, what better plan could be adopted? Has any preferable one been suggested? No. For two or three days past, the House has witnessed a conflict (not the most pleasant to any of the parties, and perhaps not very useful to the House,) between the members of the majority and minority of the Committee of Public Accounts. A continuance of this controversy will be rendered unnecessary, and altogether superseded, by a compliance with the request of the CLERK.

Under the resolution adopted some time since, said Mr. L. on the motion of his colleague, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] the Committee on Accounts had made such inquiry as appeared to them useful and called for by the resolution. That resolution was one of inquiry alone; at that time no charges were preferred. But, sir, said Mr. L. during the discussion on the motion to recommit the report, insinuations, or rather, indeed, direct charges, were made on the floor of the House, of official misconduct on the part of the CLERK, in his contract for furnishing stationery for the House. This, sir, being the fact, the case assumes an essentially different aspect from that which it in the first instance presented. In the present condition of the matter, it must strike every gentleman that the course taken by the CLERK is a discreet and proper one. He is the officer of this House, and it is due to the House, as well as to himself, that these charges of official impropriety in the contracts entered into for stationery, should be exposed to a patient and searching investigation. The Committee on Accounts have divided in opinion in the performance of their duties, under the resolution, to which I, a moment ago, made reference, and the whole matter may appear enveloped in a fog, which ought most certainly to be dissipated.

Mr. PETRIKIN here interposed, and said that the question immediately before the House was the point of order raised by himself.

Mr. LEET proceeded to remark, that if his colleague insisted upon his point of order, let it be so; he could, in the way of legitimate discussion upon that point of order, say to the House all he felt any desire to say, and it was but a word or two.

But, said Mr. L. as to this point of order, raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he would most respectfully remark, that his colleague himself, upon reflection, would find that it was untenable. How stands the case? The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of receiving, considering, and taking action upon, the memorial of the CLERK. In this manner I understood the motion of the gentleman. The House agreed to this motion, by a majority of more than two-thirds. Now, sir, said Mr. L. what will be the use of receiving the memorial, unless we proceed further, and raise the special committee, which the memorialist asks for, whose duty it will be to inquire into, investigate and report upon the whole subject connected with the furnishing stationery. In this view of the case, can any one doubt about the resolution to raise the committee being in order? Without it, the reception of the memorial would be a vain and useless work. He contended the resolution was in order, and that the point of order by his colleague could not be sustained. Now, sir, as the committee proposed to be raised, he would say, let the powers of this committee be commensurate with any and all abuses that may have been or that could be practised.

The memorialist submits himself to the House, and as he understood it (said Mr. L.) invited investigation. It ought to be made. Indeed, under the circumstances, the application of the CLERK comes with scrupulous propriety.

He, for one, never would hesitate; never would pause about authorizing an inquiry in cases where any suspicions existed, or charges were made against the official deportment of the CLERK or any other officer of the House. And he was pleased to see the fair and open manner in which the CLERK on this occasion appealed to the House to have the matter examined fully and thoroughly.

Mr. L. proceeded to say, that whilst up, he would take the opportunity of remarking, that although he would most cheerfully vote for the resolution to raise a Select Committee, in pursuance of the CLERK's request, as made in his memorial, yet he thereby meant no sort of disrespect to the honorable gentlemen composing the majority of the Committee on Accoun's. He had full confidence in those gentleman, and entertained no doubt that they had done every thing which appeared to them to be required by the terms of the resolution under which they acted. Indeed, since their report, enough has occurred to render the course now likely to be taken, acceptable to them. He had no doubt it would be.

Mr. LEET remarked that he did not feel any desire further to debate the point of order—he looked upon it as utterly unsustainable. If, said he, he could not be allowed to proceed with what he esteemed it proper for him to say, he would move the previous question on the appeal of his colleague [MR. PETRIKIN] from the decision of the CHAIR upon the point of order.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked his colleague, [Mr. LEET,] to withdraw the motion for the previous question, and he would save all further difficulty by a proposition which he purposed making.

Mr. LEET then withdrew his motion; when

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his appeal; and, for the purpose of saving further discussion, moved the previous question on the adoption of the resolution; which received a second, and the main question being ordered, the question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

1. Letter from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, containing the report of the board of officers appointed to prepare a plan for the defence of the Northern and Northeastern frontiers. On motion of Mr. HAND, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

2. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 6th April, respecting the trade with Mexico. On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

3. Depositions in relation to the New Jersey election. On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, referred to the Committee on Elections.

Various Senate bills, of a private character, taken from the SPEAKER's table, read twice, and appropriately referred.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON offered a resolution (which lies over) setting apart the 13th and 14th of May next for the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia.

The House then, on motion of Mr. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, went again into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY of Illinois in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETRIKIN had the floor, and, after some pretty caustic remarks in reply to a part of the speech of Mr. OGLE, which referred more particularly to himself, he went into a discussion on the subject of the expenditures on the public buildings, insisting that, though the extravagance was undeniably great, neither the President nor his Cabinet was responsible for it, but Congress and the architect, whom he accused either of dishonesty or incompetence.

Mr. P. having concluded a speech of considerable length,

Mr. KEIM of Pennsylvania was about replying to so much of Mr. OGLE's speech as had reference to "Old Berks;" when

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania informed him that Mr. OGLE had left the House from indisposition; upon which,

Mr. KEIM said he should defer his reply till that gentlemen was in his seat. He would only now say that the charge of Federalism either against that county or himself as its Representative could not be sustained before honorable men.

Mr. COOPER said Mr. OGLE had not charged Mr. K. with having been a Federalist, but had merely said that anti-bank Democratic Berks was represented by his honorable colleague, who was the president of a bank.

The debate was continued at great length by Messrs. REYNOLDS, STEENROD, (and WISE in explanation.)

Mr. STEENROD having concluded,

Mr. WELLER obtained the floor, and expressed his desire to make some remarks; but, complying with the request of several gentlemen, and the hour growing late, he moved that the committee rise.

On the request of Mr. STANLY, Mr. W. withdrew the motion, to enable that gentleman to make some explanations, in reply to Mr. PETRIKIN, on some matters relating to the expenditures on the public buildings.

The question being then taken on the motion that the committee rise, there appeared—ayes 34, noes 43; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN thereupon rose, and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that every day, about 4 o'clock, the House found itself without a quorum, and it would be impossible to pass the appropriation bills. He moved a call of the House, and asked the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. WISE suggested to Mr. V. not to commence this severe operation this evening; but that the House, by general consent, should agree to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

[Cries of "No, no," in all parts of the Hall.]

Mr. CRARY moved that the House adjourn;—(it being now ten minutes to five.)

Mr. ANDREWS, alluding to the practice of some gentlemen to go home to dinner, and then come back to protract the sessions of the House, asked the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; which were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 31, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Beatty, Bond, Calhoun, Coles, James Cooper, Crary, John W. Davis, Everett, Gates, Giddings, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Henry, Charles Johnston, McCarty, Mallory, Montgomery, Palen, Paynter, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, E. Rogers, Simonton, Taliaferro, Toland, Weller, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Burke, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cushing, John Davis, Garret Davis, Deberry, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Floyd, James Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Graves, Hand, John Hill of N. C. Holleman, Hunt, Jackson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Parmenter, Petrikin, Proffit, Randall, Rives, Russell, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Trumbull, Turney, Vanderpoel, D. D. Wagener, Jared W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—64.

So the House refused to adjourn.

And the question recurring on the motion that there be a call of the House, the yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 48, nay 55, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Black, Blackwell, Burke, Carroll, Carter, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Craig, Cushing, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Floyd, Galbraith, Graham, Hand, Holleman, Jackson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Lewis, McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Parrish, Proffit, Rives, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Stanly Strong, Swearingen, Taylor, Trumbull, Turney, Vanderpoel, Jared W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Beatty, Bond, Boyd, Anson Brown, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Casey, James Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dennis, Doan, Doig, Everett, James Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Habersham, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Henry, Hill of North Carolina, Hunt, Charles Johnston, Leet, Leonard, Lucas, McCarty, Montgomery, Newhard, Palen, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Randall, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgeway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Simonton, Steenrod, Stuart, Taliaferro, Toland, Weller, John White, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—55.

So the call was not ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. WISE,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, April 18, 1840.

On motion of Mr. J. GARLAND, the Select Committee appointed yesterday in relation to the contracts for stationery was ordered to consist of five members, (the number having been accidentally omitted in the resolution.) And the journal was amended accordingly.

Mr. PAYNTER, by universal consent, presented a memorial from the pilots of the Delaware Bay, asking the repeal of the law passed the seventh of August, 1837, for reasons set forth in the memorial.

The SPEAKER announced that the unfinished business of the morning hour was the resolution heretofore reported by Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, proposing to abolish the said committee, on the alleged ground that its duties had been assigned to other committees.

Mr. HALL of Vermont, who was entitled to the floor, (and who is a member of the said committee,) addressed the House in support of the resolution, and in reply to some of the opposing arguments of Messrs. CUSHING and WISE. Mr. H. insisted that he had heard nothing calculated to change the opinion which he entertained in committee when he concurred originally in the resolution—namely, that the rule constituting this committee had become a dead letter, and that it ought to be abolished. He said the gentlemen who had opposed the abolition of the committee, had presented so little in the way of argument, that what they had lacked on that score they had made up in denunciation.

If the attack of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] was energetic and spirited, that of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was more so. That gentleman [Mr. WISE] had given to the House the fifteenth edition of his speeches against this corrupt Administration, and he (Mr. H.) had always listened to him with admiration. Heretofore he [Mr. W.] had confined himself to his political enemies, now he attacks his political friends; and this committee are accused of skulking, and having deceived their friends in this House.

The hinge (said Mr. H.) on which the subject seemed to turn, was, in the opinion of the two gentlemen, that a new era had arrived in the subject of investigation. The gentlemen had been long members of the House, and the committee was of long standing. They had never taken any interest in it until the present time, and seemed to have acquired newborn zeal on the subject.

It seemed that a new era had arrived in the subject of investigation, now that the gentlemen had discovered that there was a majority of their own friends on the committee. But if they would inform themselves of the true history of the committee, they would find that during the three sessions of last Congress there had also been a majority of Opposition members on the committee. There were during that Congress five Opposition members to four of the Administration.

Under these circumstances, he was surprised that gentlemen had waited until now before waking up on the subject of these investigations.

Mr. H. said the committee were unanimous that their functions had ceased, and went into a long argument, founded on the rules, to show that the general powers belonging to that committee also existed in the other committee, which had been organized subsequently. He showed that the specific powers of the Committee on Public Accounts had been transferred to the Committees on the Departments. He could find no jurisdiction in that committee which had not been transferred to those six committees. This committee had not made a report since the year 1822; but he did not claim any exemption of performance of duties because of the neglect of the committee to report heretofore; but being of opinion that they had no power to investigate, he thought it right and proper that the committee had reported the resolution. If it did no other good, it would at least elicit an expression of opinion by the House as to the powers of the committee, and by which he was understood to say the committee would feel bound to abide, for the future government of its action.

Mr. H. had not concluded when, the hour of one having arrived, the SPEAKER announced the special order of the day.

On leave given, Mr. BIDDLE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill in relation to the Red river raft, accompanied by an adverse report; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER announced the select committee in relation to stationery contracts to consist of the following gentlemen:

Messrs. BURKE of New Hampshire, BRIGGS of Massachusetts, LEET of Pennsylvania, WISE of Virginia, and DAWSON of Georgia.

The SPEAKER laid before the House certain depositions in relation to the New Jersey election; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

On leave given, Mr. BLACK presented a memorial from citizens of Savannah, in relation to the construction of a custom-house at that place; which was, on his motion, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY of Illinois in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840.

Mr. WELLER being entitled to the floor on the above bill, in the course of his remarks adverted to the proposition to separate the banks from the Government. He showed that the financial system of the State of Ohio was somewhat similar in its details to the Sub-treasury bill; and that it worked very well. That not one dollar of the public money could be touched, except by appropriation by law. And he argued that if it worked so well in a State Government, why could it not be adopted by the General Government, and prove equally beneficial?

Mr. EVERETT here rose to a point of order. He wished to know whether it was proper for the gentleman from Ohio to discuss the Sub-Treasury bill.

The CHAIRMAN said he was compelled to decide, although great latitude of debate had been allowed, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] was not in order.

Mr. STANLY moved that the gentleman have leave to proceed.

Mr. CUSHING wished to know, before the gentleman was allowed to proceed, whether it was the decision of the CHAIR that the gentleman was out of order.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. CUSHING said if it was to be the understanding, from the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] that this latitude of debate was to be allowed, and the rules were to be thus violated, he had a speech upon the subject of the South American and China trade which he wished to make, and would give notice, that he should avail himself of an opportunity to make it on this bill.

Mr. STANLY made some response to Mr. CUSHING, which was not distinctly understood.

Mr. CUSHING merely wished to know what was the decision of the committee. If it should determine that gentlemen were to proceed out of order, he would be compelled to bow with submission, but should at the same time avail himself of an opportunity to make the speech on the subject in which he was interested.

The CHAIR reiterated that hitherto it had been customary to permit gentlemen to indulge in a latitudinous course of debate on this bill; but, as he was called upon to decide, he must say that the gentleman was not in order.

Mr. DAWSON proposed a compromise—that the CHAIR would permit gentlemen to indulge in some latitude on this bill, though he was opposed to it at the commencement, and that, when the House should go into committee on other bills, that gentlemen would then be confined to a discussion of the subject before it.

Mr. REED, in all his experience, had never known such latitude of discussion to be allowed. He had proposed to the House at some previous time that all such discussions as had been indulged in should be permitted on the President's message. But inasmuch as the House had refused his proposition for that purpose, he hoped that full latitude would be permitted.

Mr. LEET said that, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WELLER,] who was indisposed on yesterday, he would suggest that he [Mr. W.] would defer making a speech bearing on the Independent Treasury bill, as it was important that action should be taken on the bill which was now under consideration. Another bill would shortly be introduced, and then the gentleman could present his views on the Independent Treasury. Mr. L. suggested this course, from the consideration that the House would take action on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill to-day. He made this suggestion, not out of any disrespect, but from a high conception of his [Mr. W's] patriotism, knowledge of the facts, and his sense of propriety.

Mr. WELLER was understood to say, he was willing to accede to the proposition of his friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. LEET,] provided the committee was disposed to take the vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. STANLY again moved that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to proceed.

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. WELLER proceeded, and after some time he remarked, that as many gentlemen seemed anxious to have final action on the bill before the House, he would say, that if the committee would take the vote on the bill to-day, he would defer his remarks till some future occasion.

Mr. LEET remarked, that with the permission of his honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. WELLER,] he would again most respectfully suggest, that it was expedient, wise, and proper, that final action should be had on the bill now before the House. Most of the items contained in it were in pursuance of law, and could not be rejected. No attack against such items can be sustained. If they are wrong, the laws authorizing them should be repealed.

He was pleased to hear his friend from Ohio again say that he was willing this course should be taken—it was creditable to him. The appropriation bill, said Mr. L. ought to be passed. Much of the money, he understood, was absolutely needed by persons, to pay whose salaries it was intended.

Mr. HOPKINS here rose to a point of order.

Mr. LEET remarked that he was through, and therefore no point of order need be made.

Mr. CHINN said he know the gentleman from Pennsylvania was out of order; but the object was so palpable, and so promotive of the public service, that he was anxious that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LEET] should succeed. He hoped no one would interpose further objection.

Mr. PROFFIT said he objected, and proceeded to give his reasons why great latitude should be given to this debate. Mr. P. having concluded,

Mr. WELLER then resumed, and concluded his remarks in favor of the Sub-Treasury bill, and in defence of the Administration, which will be given hereafter. He was followed by

Mr. BROWN of Mississippi, who spoke with great animation, chiefly on the subject of banks; opposing that of the United States, and advocatin the Sub-Treasury scheme; and in the course of his remarks he pronounced a eulogium on the character of Mr. CALHOUN.

Mr. JENIFER inquired whether a certain extract which he read from the report of a speech made by Mr. BROWN while canvassing before the people in Mississippi, was correct; in which he was said to have declared that if Mr. Van Buren should to-morrow resolve to abandon the Sub-Treasury scheme, Mr. B would no longer advocate it? and, also, whether Mr. B. had not been the advocate of that system—the issue of post notes—the practical result of which had almost ruined Mississippi?

Mr. BROWN explained; admitted that he had used the words imputed to him, but said that the report was garbled, and omitted other parts of his speech which would put a different aspect on the declaration. He had only meant that as he was the humblest member of his party, if those who were its prominent leaders concluded to abandon the Sub-Treasury, it would not be for him to assume on his feeble shoulders such a weight as that of so great and important a measure: and he should, therefore, cease to advocate it before the people.

As to voting in favor of the issue of post notes when first proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, he had been in favor of it: but as lately practised by the banks in Mississippi, he had been the leader of those who opposed the measure.

Mr. EVERETT having obtained the floor for the purpose of addressing the committee, without doing so, yielded it to

Mr. REED, on whose motion the committee rose; when

On motion of Mr. WISE,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, April 20, 1840.

DEATH OF HON. H. L. WHITE.

After the reading of the journal,

Mr. ANDERSON rose and said:

Mr. President: I rise to perform a very painful duty; and adverting to the circumstances in which I last saw the distinguished individual of whom I am about to speak, it is exceedingly unexpected to me. I received, sir, this morning, a few moments before I took my seat in this chamber, a letter from a friend at KNOXVILLE, announcing the death of Judge WHITE, and although we had recent intelligence of his enfeebled health, I had still hoped that it might be restored, and his life protracted far beyond the present hour.

In rising, sir, to move the adoption of the resolutions which I shall submit to the Senate upon this occasion, in relation to this distinguished man, it is not improper to recite briefly a few of the leading facts of his history.

In doing this, it is not inappropriate to remark that he was a member of this body during the early part of this session, and has often received here the honored distinction of presiding over its deliberations; and the proceeding which I propose, I am informed by some of the more experienced members of the Senate, is within the analogy of those rules under which we offer respect and courtesy to the memory of our departed associates. I am sure, sir, there is not one of all by whom I am surrounded, who will not, under the circumstances, most cheerfully extend the tribute of regard to his character.

He emigrated at an early day to Tennessee, while yet a youth, and settled near to the very town in which his remains are now deposited. He was the descendant of a father who had participated in the patriotic struggles of our Revolutionary war, and who, in transferring his residence to Tennessee, brought with him the spirit of enterprise and love of country necessary to the settlement of a perilous frontier. He received a classical education, and soon turned his attention to the study of the law, and at once engaged with ardor and success in the pursuits of that profession. His associates, from his youth up to the period when he had entered upon the duties of manhood, entertained for him the kindest and most sincere personal attachment, and were gratified at the rapid progress which he made in the confidence and favor of the public, in every thing which pertained to the duties of his profession. He was several times elected to the Legislature, and twice, I believe, sir, placed upon the Supreme bench of the State. In all these stations he filled the measure of private and of public expectation. His mind was clear and vigorous, and took within its range a vivid perception of the peculiar duties which belonged to each position. Subsequently to this, he received a high mark of the confidence of our Government by his appointment as a commissioner under a very important treaty. The fidelity and ability with which he executed that trust are well known to those who conferred it, and to those who felt, or in any way participated in its action.

It was after this that he was transferred to the higher distinction of a seat in this body; and I am now surrounded by those who have served with him here, and who can fully appreciate his private and public worth. In all the personal relations of his life, at home and abroad, he stood upon elevated ground. His private character was without reproach; and I feel confident that every Senator will concur in this tribute to his memory. He now lies buried, sir, in the country of his adoption; and I trust that we will pass unanimously the resolutions which I now submit.

Mr. A. then sent to the table the following resolutions:

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. HUGH L. WHITE, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved unanimously, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. HUGH L. WHITE, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PRESTON said: I do not know, Mr. President, whether I am entitled to the honor I am about to assume in seconding the resolutions which have just been offered by the Senator from Tennessee, in honor of his late distinguished colleague; and yet, sir, I am not aware that any one present is more entitled to this melancholy honor, if it belongs to long acquaintance, to sincere admiration, and to intimate intercourse. If these circumstances do not entitle me to speak, I am sure every Senator will feel, in the emotions which swell his own bosom, an apology for my desire to relieve my own, by bearing testimony to the virtues and talents, the long services and great usefulness, of Judge WHITE.

My infancy and youth were spent in a region contiguous to the sphere of his earlier fame and usefulness. As long as I can remember any thing, I remember the deep confidence he had inspired as a wise and upright Judge, in which station no man ever enjoyed a purer reputation, or established a more implicit reliance in his abilities and honesty. There was an antique sternness and justness in his character. By a general consent he was called Cato. Subsequently, at a period of our public affairs very analogus to the present, he occupied a position which placed him at the head of the financial institutions of East Tennessee. He sustained them by his individual character. The name of HUGH L. WHITE was a guarantee that never failed to attract confidence. Institutions were sustained by the credit of an individual, and the only wealth of that individual was his character. From this more limited sphere of usefulness and reputation, he was first brought to this more conspicuous stage as a member of an important commission on the Spanish treaty, in which he was associated with Mr. Tazewell and Mr. King. His learning, his ability, his firmness, and industry, immediately extended the sphere of his reputation to the boundaries of the country. Upon the completion of that duty, he came into this Senate. Of his career here, I need not speak. His grave and venerable form is even now before us—that air of patient attention, of grave deliberation, of unrelaxed firmness. Here his position was of the highest—beloved, respected, honored; always in his place—always prepared for the business in hand—always bringing to it the treasured reflections of a sedate and vigorous understanding. Over one department of our deliberations he exercised a very peculiar control. In the management of our complex and difficult relations with the Indians we all deferred to him, and to this he addressed himself with unsparing labor, and with a wisdom a patient benevolence that justified and vindicated the confidence of the Senate.

In private life he was amiable and ardent. The current of his feelings was warm and strong. His long familiarity with public affairs had not damped the natural ardor of his temperament. We all remember the deep feeling with which he so recently took leave of this body, and how profoundly that feeling was reciprocated. The good will, the love, the respect which we bestowed upon him then, now give depth and energy to the mournful feelings with which we offer a solemn tribute to his memory.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, April 20, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order during the morning hour, was the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWENEY,] to reconsider the vote refusing leave to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to report a bill proposing to regulate the fees of the clerks, marshals, and attorneys in the District Courts of the United States.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky suggested, that as neither of the gentlemen was in, that the question be informally passed over until they were present; which suggestion was acquiesced in by the House.

Mr. WISE remarked that he perceived by the papers that he had been appointed on the Select Committee in relation to the official conduct of the CLERK of the House. He said he did not wish to avoid any of the duties devolving upon him as a Representative, but must ask to be excused from serving on that committee. If continued on that committee, however, he would discharge his duty faithfully. The probability was, that on the report of the committee, there would be a debate on its proceedings, and it would require some effort on his part to support any views which he might submit in the form of a report. He had been positively forbidden by his physician to indulge in debate, and found that he must desist. He had last week participated in debate, which had resulted to his injury. He (Mr. W.) had a disease of the throat, which compelled him to be silent, and he would try to be silent hereafter. Besides, he would shortly be absent from the city. He again asked to be excused from serving on the committee. A gentleman in this House, a physician, who had been opposed to him in politics, had told him (Mr. W.) that he must avoid the business of the House. He therefore asked to be excused; which request was granted.

Mr. BANKS, on leave, introduced further evidence in relation to a certain claim pending before the Committee of Ways and Means, which was referred to that committee.

Mr. DAWSON also asked to be excused from serving on the Select Committee. He was a member of the Committee of Claims, which rendered it almost impracticable for him to do so. Were it not for other duties, he would discharge his duty on the Select Committee with great pleasure. He was, however, excused by the rules; but thought it proper to notify the House that he could not serve.

Mr. LEET said, if the gentleman from Georgia asked to be excused, he should feel himself bound to do likewise. He admitted there was great propriety in excusing the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] as he was sick; but as the gentleman from Georgia had no such excuse, he saw no reason for extending the indulgence to him. It was well known that the duties to be performed on the committee would necessarily be of an arduous and unpleasant nature. He hoped the gentleman would consent to go through with his labors; but if he persisted in his request to be excused, he, Mr. L. must ask to be excused also, as he saw no reason why one gentleman should be exempted in preference to another.

The CHAIR wished to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania submitted any motion.

Mr. LEET said, he did not intend to make any motion, but merely rose for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman from Georgia the propriety of withdrawing his request.

Mr. CROSS asked leave to submit a resolution, which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That members be authorized to hand to the CLERK, at the CLERK's table, such petitions as are admissible by the rules of the House, first endorsing thereon their names, and the name of the committee to which such petitions belong; and that the petitions so handed in be entered by the CLERK in the same manner as if presented in the usual form; but all petitions subject to the operation of the resolution of the House adopted on the subject of petitions touching the abolition of slavery, shall take the course prescribed by that resolution.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS objected.

Mr. WISE suggested that all petitions of a doubtful character, under the rule of the House, might be left for the decision of the SPEAKER. He hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would withdraw his objection.

Mr. CROSS said that a precedent for his motion was to be found on the journals of 1835, and felt constrained, under a sense of duty, to move for a suspension of the rules.

Mr. SMITH of Maine referred to a similar precedent in 1839.

The question was taken, and the rules were suspended—yeas 95, nays 42.

Mr. ADAMS having risen for the purpose of making some remarks on the resolution, he yielded, when

Mr. MORGAN moved to reconsider the vote on suspending the rules.

Mr. BANKS, being of opinion that no good could arise from a discussion, moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ADAMS claimed the floor to offer his amendment, observing that the resolution worked a very important change in the rules of the House, especially by empowering each member to decide, instead of the House, to what committee a memorial should be referred.

Mr. BANKS insisted on his motion; when

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved to lay the resolution on the table, which was carried by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 96, nays 84.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

The morning hour having expired—

The House went again into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY, of Illinois, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. EVERETT addressed the committee for a considerable time upon the bill, adverting to the change in the practice of the House as to the general debate on the affairs of the Union, which used always to take place on a reference of the President's message, but was now irregularly indulged on other bills. He laid the blame of the discursive character of the debate on the Administration side of the House, which had first begun it, but considered the debate, though not strictly regular, very valuable and important. He then went into the merits of the bill, and instituted a comparison of the expenditures of the Government in different years.

Mr. KEIM followed, and, after some preliminary remarks, in which he contended that the existence of the Committee on Public Buildings was no longer necessary, proceeded to give his views in relation to the public buildings of this city. He said it would be remembered, that when, at the last Congress, an appropriation was asked for the purpose of removing the Treasury building, owing to its having been located on an improper site, he had opposed it on the ground that the expense of removal would equal the amount then expended in its construction. It was, however, in vain that the architect had told them it would resemble the temple at Ephesus, and that it had all the qualities of the Grecian order, for he (Mr. K.) was satisfied that the building was not proper for the accommodation of the clerks. It was not a fit abode for men, but better calculated for the worship of the gods of whose temple it was said to be an imitation. In fact, the public buildings were like the committee rooms of the Capitol, which, for inconvenience and unhealthiness, could not be excelled. After adverting to the various appropriations expended on the Treasury building and Patent Office, he gave his opinion that it would be better now for Congress to make a final, but adequate, appropriation for their completion, and arrange it so that some one should be held responsible for the proper expenditure of the money.

Mr. K. then replied to some of the charges made by his colleague [Mr. OGLE] in his recent speech on the alleged abuses of the Administration. Mr. K. said he had not originally intended noticing them, as he considered it the duty of at least one portion of the House to remain silent, as a set off to the great amount of time consumed by others.

In the course of his remarks, (which will be given more fully hereafter,) Mr. K. alluded to the charges made by his colleague in relation to the furniture of the President's House. He said he would envy the feelings of no man, who would, like a serpent, creep on his belly into the President's dwelling to see if he could not, by chance, discover some little article of convenience that did not exactly accord with his views of propriety. He could not envy the feelings of the man, whose magnanimous soul would lead him perhaps into the very bed chamber, to discover if, perchance, there was a single yard more of cloth in the pillow case than he might deem consistent with the strict principles of Democracy.

Mr. K. also alluded to another charge in relation to the aristocracy of the President, and his riding in a coach and four. He said, for his part, he knew of no coach and four; but he knew that when the President, in his late tour, passed through Pennsylvania, the vehicle in which he travelled was looked upon by the country people with surprise, as being too humble even for themselves. Mr. K. said, that while the President was sitting in a common tavern, an old Dutchman came in and said to him (Mr. K.) in his teutonic dialect, "Where is that great man," although he was sitting next to the President at the very time.

On the question being asked, "Why, do you not know him?" the old man answered, "No;" and was surprised when he learned Mr. Van Buren was the person beside him. The old countryman said he expected to see a man proud and overbearing, and one who had outriders to his carriage.

Mr. K. then went on to say, that although this charge of aristocracy was not true with regard to the President, yet he could mention an instance where a former President had travelled through Pennsylvania in a coach and four, with outriders. That was the elder Adams. Yes, he did travel in the manner wrongly imputed to Mr. Van Buren; and when the carriage of President Adams was dashing along the turnpike road, because an old man did not call in his dog, one of the outriders shot the poor animal.

Mr. K. also noticed the attack made by his colleague on the sons of the President. He thought that at least the gentleman might have spared himself that trouble, as whatever might have been the sins of the father, the sons ought not to be held amenable. He would suggest, however, that his colleague should have them shut up in a crib, or a "log cabin, with the string of the latch pulled inside," to keep them from mischief; also, that a "committee" should be appointed to watch over them, and protect them from annoyance.

Mr. K. then adverted to the charge made by his colleague in relation to Mr. Buchanan, viz: that he had opposed the war. He (Mr. K.) denied it That Senator never opposed the war, but, on the contrary, there was abundant evidence to prove that he went out to meet the enemy, and was encamped on the frontiers of the State.

The CHAIRMAN gave the floor to Mr. EVERETT, to enable him to present certain additional items in the comparison of expenditures. After which,

Mr. OGLE appealed to Mr. PARMENTER to yield the floor to him, to enable him to reply to Mr. KEIM.

Mr. PARMENTER was willing, he said, to yield the floor, if he could be assured that the gentleman would confine his remarks to a personal explanation, and not enter into any extended reply to the argument of Mr. KEIM.

Mr. OGLE said his reply would cover the ground of the attack, but that he should not go beyond it.

Mr. PARMENTER replied at some length in refutation of the charges of the Opposition against the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. The Whig party, notwithstanding all their charges, and the severe scrutiny of the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, have never been able to discover a want of capacity in that officer. But the charges which had been heretofore confined to the President and the Secretary, are now, to a considerable degree, transferred to the Postmaster General; and after all their attacks on him, every one admits that he is an officer of consummate ability, and of great research and industry. Mr. P. then replied to the arguments of Mr. CUSHING in relation to the national expenditures, and proved that th

Opposition were mainly answerable for the increase; that they had, in most cases, voted for the objects causing the increase, such as light houses, harbors, the pension system, and Indian wars—and they actually acquiesced in all the appropriations making up the aggregate of increase. He adverted to one item which had been specifically referred to by his colleague, [Mr. CUSHING,] clerk hire—and showed that in some of the Departments the expense on this account had been diminished since the administration of Mr. Adams; whilst in others it had not increased in proportion to the accumulation of business, growing out of the increased wants, extension, and population of the the country. He admitted that the Democratic party, when the Treasury of the nation was in a plethoric state, to get rid of the evils which they believed would result from a distribution of the surplus among the States, were in favor of large expenditures on national objects—such as fortifications, the navy, and light-houses. And how much better would it be now if that policy had prevailed. The national defences would now be in a proper condition, and many of the evils which now afflict the country, would have been prevented. He then adverted to the charge made by the Whigs, that the Democratic party was the spoils party, and showed that the Administration had been considerably indulgent to their political opponents, by permitting them to remain in office; whilst, on the other hand, the Whigs, in every State in the Union where they had the power, and particularly in Massachusetts, had practised the most indiscriminate proscription. If it was a fault that the Administration had, in some instances, removed political opponents, the Whigs in Massachusetts had committed that fault in a tenfold degree. He referred to the blue book of Massachusetts, and was understood to say that out of 830 officers, 800 belonged to the Whig party. The people, he said, expected that the Administration would look on their political friends with favor. The present Administration had been liberal to a fault towards their enemies.

Mr. P. in reply to the remarks of Mr. OGLE of Pennsylvania, who had asked what Democracy was, showed that the Democracy was now what it was during the war—that it was that which supported the honor and dignity of the country and preserved the great principle of equal rights on which the Government was based; whilst on the other hand, the Whig party, in principle, were identical with the Federal party which, during the war, took ground diametrically opposed to the best interests of the nation, and threw every embarrassment in the way of the Government in the effort it was making to preserve the honor of its flag, and in defending the sacred rights of the seamen, to secure them from impressment by the British Government. There never have been but two parties in this nation—the old Federal—which was always adverse to the best interests of the people, and the Democratic party—and there were but two parties now: the Whig, which, in his State (Massachusetts) was synonymous with the Federal party; and the great Democratic party which now supports the present Administration. To show the gentleman from Pennnsylvania [Mr. OGLE] who it was that composed the Whig party, and what Federalism was, he referred to his colleague, [Mr. SALTONSTALL,] who was one of the leaders of the Whig party of the present day. He did not believe his colleague had ever supported a Democratic Administration. Mr. P. was understood to say that his colleague was opposed to the administrations of Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and Van Buren. But now he was conspicuous for his support of General Harrison. He was one of the great Central Intelligence Committee, composed of Whig members of Congress. This committee, of which his colleague [Mr. SALTONSTALL] was a conspicuous member, has called upon the people to bring back the Government to its former principles and its former precedents—to place in power those who will carry out the principles of former Presidents. Now he had said that his colleague had never supported a Democratic Administration, therefore the principles and precedents to which he wished to bring back the Government, and to carry out which he wishes to place General Harrison in the Presidential chair, must be the principles of the old Federal party, of which he was a member—principles which must be identical with those which he is now in support of. To let the House and the country know what those principles were, he read from Niles's Register of October 8, 1814, a report made to the Massachusetts Legislature by a committee, of which his colleague [Mr. SALTONSTALL] was a member, recommending the Hartford Convention. Mr. P. read over the names of those who composed that convention, and showed that all who are living belong to the Whig party; and that all those who had recently died, had departed in that faith. The same party in the Massachusetts Legislature, that authorized and supported the Hartford Convention, resolved that it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at the defeats of the enemies of their country. But the people of his State subsequently expunged that foul blot from the record of proceedings.

The Hartford Convention passed a resolution authorizing an embassy to wait upon Mr. Madison, to say to him that he must change his policy or resign. All the gentlemen now living, who constituted a part of that embassy, are members of the Whig party; and Mr. Sullivan, another member, recently deceased, died in the faith of Federalism and Whigery.

Mr. P. after commenting at some length on the objects of that convention, showed what were its principles, identified the Whig party with those who entertained those principles; and argued such were the principles, to which his colleague, in connection with other members of the Whig party, in the appeal to the people, through their circular, wish to restore the Government. Mr. P's remarks, and the documentary proofs, will be published hereafter.

Mr. SALTONSTALL obtained the floor in reply; when

Mr. ANDREWS, remarking that he had been here since 10 o'clock this morning, attending either in committee room or on the House, moved that the committee rise.

On which motion no quorum voted.

And the committee rose, and their chairman reported the fact to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House further testimony in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which, on motion of Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, was referred to the Committee of Elections.

And then, at something after half past 5 o'clock, The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 21, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted certain resolutions of the Legislature of Florida, asking that pre-emption rights may be given to certain settlers upon the public lands in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial of citizens of Michigan, praying that the punishment of William Lyon Mackenzie may be mitigated; which was ordered to be transmitted to the President of the United States.

Mr GRUNDY presented the memorial of citizens of Memphis, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of Levi Owen, and other citizens of Illinois, praying that measures may be taken for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory, and the appointment of John Rowan, of Kentucky, as Governor thereof; which was laid on the table.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of members of the bar in Mississippi, praying a removal of the Federal courts from Jackson to Vicksburg; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of a number of citizens of Jefferson county, Missi-sippi, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of Hinds county, Mississippi, of both political parties, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law, which would be imperative on banks and merchants, and optional with other classes of the community.

Also, a memorial from citizens of Rankin county, Mississippi, of similar tenor.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented a memorial, which he said was signed by a number of respectable citizens of that State, and, like another he had presented some days ago, embraced not only merchants and traders, but farmers, planters, and mechanics, of much respectability.

Mr. C. said he would take this occasion to remark, that he believed some measure of the kind was necessary for the security of creditors, as well as debtors. For want of a general bankrupt law, he said a debtor had the right, in most of the States, if not all, to prefer one or more creditors to the exclusion of the others. This he thought unfair and unjust. When an individual had not the means of paying the full amount of all his debts, there should be an apportionment amongst the creditors, according to some fair and just ratio: Again: he said it was extremely hard that a man who once became indebted beyond his ability to pay, (though it may have happened by misfortune, or causes not to be foreseen,) should, throughout the remainder of his life, continue hopelessly involved, his energies crippled, and useless to his family and country. He hoped some measure would be reported to remedy this evil, upon which all could agree. The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying the imposition of a duty on foreign silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of citizens of Wayne county, New York, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Clayton, and other citizens of Delaware, on the subject of a canal across the isthmus of Darien, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be transmitted to the President of the United States; which was agreed to.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the report of the Secretary of War, relative to the process termed "Kyanizing," reported in favor of printing the same; which was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill in relation to donations of land to certains persons in the State of Arkansas, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, that settlers on the 16th section be allowed a pre-emption right to the same; and also,

Resolutions of the Legislature of Florida, for the passage of a law granting floating pre-emption rights to certain settlers, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the bill from the House for the relief of the heirs of John Wilkinson, deceased; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House for the relief of Cornelius Tiers, reported the same with an amendment; the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the construction of certain harbors on Lake Michigan; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the Senate a statement of the names of banks in which special deposites in specie were made to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in anticipation of receiving therefor Treasury notes issued under the acts of 1837, 1838, and 1839—and of the date and amount of each delivery of Treasury notes on account of having received certificates of such special deposites; with the rates of interest of such Treasury notes, and the names of the persons or banks to whom the same were delivered. The bill for the relief of Samuel Crapin;

were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill granting to the State of Michigan a quantity of land to aid said State in the construction of a canal around the falls of St. Marie, was taken up on its third reading, and was opposed by Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, PRESTON, CRITTENDEN, and BUCHANAN, and advocated by Messrs. NORVELL, HENDERSON, PORTER, and WALKER; when, after some remarks by Mr. TAPPAN, it was, on his motion, recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, April 21, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the resolution reported from the Committee on Public Expenditures by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS,] proposing to abolish that committee, on the ground that the duties belonging to said committee had been transferred to other committees.

Mr. HALL, who was entitled to the floor, was about proceeding in continuation of his remarks; when

Mr. CUSHING wished, before the gentleman from Vermont proceeded in his remarks, to call his attention to a portion of his speech which appeared in the Globe of last evening. The gentleman was represented as referring to a new era of investigation, and to the new born zeal of the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Virginia at the present session. Now he, Mr. C. would remind the gentleman from Vermont that both himself and the gentleman from Virginia had, at the last Congress, repeatedly called on the committee to report. He recollected distinctly that Mr. WISE had more than once demanded of the committee whether they were ready to report. So far as regarded himself, it was true that he did not move a resolution to compel the committee to act, because that course, in his opinion, would have been very insidious. But when the subject was brought directly before the House, he thought it his duty to pursue the course he had.

Mr. WISE said that, for himself, he recollected having repeatedly called in the committees for reports. Also that, on one occasion, he gave notice that he should renew his demand daily, until reports should be made.

Mr. HALL had no distinct recollection of what he did say on the occasion alluded to, but if he had stated any thing which did injustice to the gentleman, he would willingly correct it. But he had understood the gentleman from Massachusetts as taking the ground, that as the Committee on Public Expenditures had now a majority of Opposition members, under these circumstances much more was to be expected from them than had heretofore been done. He had understood the gentleman from Virginia as having taken the same ground. It was that which had induced him to speak of their new-born zeal, as he had shown that during the time of Mr. Speaker Polk, there was also a majority of Opposition members on that committee, and that the zeal of the gentlemen was just as applicable to that period as it was now. His remarks had been based on that understanding, viz: that the gentlemen expected more from the committee now than formerly, whereas its political character had been the same during the whole of the last Congress as it was now. If he had misapprehended them, he was ready to make a correction, as, in the remarks he made, he did not intend any offence to either of the gentlemen.

Mr. WISE repeated that it would be in the recollection of many old members of the House, that he did call repeatedly for reports during the last session. The gentleman might state the fact or not, just as he pleased.

Mr. HALL said he had himself a distinct recollection of the gentleman from Virginia having made a call upon the committee for a report. But it was on the point that the gentleman considered a new era had arrived, owing to a different political complexion of the committee, that his remarks had been founded, and which had induced him to show that its complexion had been the same during the whole of the last Congress.

Mr. H. made a long argument in support of his position, and made some remarks in reply to Mr. WISE, to which that gentleman responded.

Mr. LEET obtained the floor, and having spoken a few minutes in opposition to the adoption of the resolution for abolishing the Committee on Public Expenditures,

The SPEAKER announced that the morning hour had expired.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. SALTONSTALL prefaced his remarks by an allusion to an article which had appeared in the Globe, and which, he had been informed, was sent to that paper in the shape of a communication, furnished probably by a member of the House. The article Mr. S. read, and said the drift of it was to show that he was peculiarly sensitive in relation to the Hartford Convention. Mr. S. then went on to make comments on the dialogue said to have taken place, on the occasion alluded to, between him and Mr. WATTERSON, and denied having said any thing about the Hartford Convention.

Mr. WATTERSON said he did not distinctly hear what the gentleman from Massachusetts said when he had called him (Mr. W.) to order the day. But he had understood him to say that "he would like to know what the Hartford Convention had to do with the question before the House." He (Mr. W.) could not hear the words distinctly himself, but was informed by several gentlemen, who were near him at the time, that the gentleman from Massachusetts had used the words attributed to him; but, as that gentleman had denied having used the language, he (Mr. W.) could have no doubt but that the gentlemen were mistaken.

Mr. SALTONSTALL repeated that he did not use the words, and he challenged any gentleman to get up in his place and say that he did say any thing in relation to the Hartford Convention.

A member here rose and said, that he happened to be standing near Mr. S. at the time alluded to by the Globe; and he was certain that the word used was Harrisburg, and not Hartford Convention.

Mr. WATTERSON was understood to say that he did make the remarks attributed to him in the communication published in the Globe, but there was so much confusion in the hall at the time, that it was doubtful whether he was heard on the other side of the hall or not. But that was of no consequence, as, if the gentleman did not on that occasion allude to the Hartford Convention, he had risen now for the purpose of defending it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL denied that his present object was to defend the Hartford Convention. He had risen for another purpose. Mr. S. then proceeded to notice an article which appeared in the Globe of last evening, and which charged him and others with circulating in Virginia a certain document, giving a false statement of the different amounts of expenditure of the present and former Administrations, calculated to prejudice the public mind, by a presentation of statements ex parte in their nature. Also, that the said document was got up in a form calculated to lead the people to suppose it was an official document of the House.

Mr. C. denied the allegation. He said it was neither more nor less than a copy of a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, word for word.

At the request of Messrs. WISE and RICE GARLAND, the document was read by the CLERK, and compared with the official papers, of which it was said to be a copy.

Mr. WISE stated, in behalf of an absent colleague, that the document was prepared for the press by that gentleman, and he was responsible for its correctness; and that it was a true and faithful copy of the official papers, from which it was compiled. Mr. W. then called upon his colleagues to point out any instance, if they could, where the document was not a true copy.

Mr. HOPKINS said, that for his part he had not examined the document, nor had he heard of its existence previous to its production by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTONSTALL.] But he would submit to his colleague whether it was not due to them, as an act of justice, to have presented with that document the names of the individual members who had voted for the appropriations of the public money. He put it to the gentleman [Mr. W.] whether a majority of his political friends had not themselves voted for those appropriations.

Mr. WISE said his colleague had given no answer. He repeated his question, and asked him whether the document was a true copy or not. It was not the business of his party to present the views of the Administration with the documents they chose to present to the people. Mr. W. in answer to a question, admitted that the document had been sent to Virginia with a view of influencing the election; and as the correctness of it was not called in question by his colleagues, he should forthwith take 2,000 of them from the printer, and send them for distribution, as correct.

At this moment great confusion prevailed in the hall, arising from a sudden personal rencontre between Messrs. RICE GARLAND and BYNUM. The combatants were immediately separated by the interposition of other members, amidst great noise and confusion.

The SPEAKER, at the request of several members, took the chair, and, with much difficulty, succeeded in restoring order.

Mr. WISE moved that the gentlemen be taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The SPEAKER said that as the Committee of the Whole had not regularly risen, now that order had been restored, he would call upon the chairman of the committee [Mr. CASEY] to resume the chair.

Mr. DROMGOOLE knew nothing of the commencement or cause of the affair which had just disturbed the harmony of the proceedings, and did not mean to impute inceptive fault to any one, but he, for one, could not consent to resume the business in committee, without some action being had thereon. He felt it his duty, and the duty of gentlemen of all parties, to unite in preserving the order and dignity of the House. It was due to themselves, and to the people whom they represented, that a stop should be put to such disgraceful proceedings, and that the disorder should be prevented from going any further.

Mr. WISE, before any motion was made, would like to know from the SPEAKER, what was the parliamentary course of proceeding in such cases.

The SPEAKER was understood to say it would be parliamentary to raise a committee for the purpose of investigating the facts. It had also been the practice to put a specific motion to the House itself. Heretofore, he believed, the House had not gone further than to entertain a motion submitted to itself, and not to send the matter to a committee of inquiry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he had been here some years, but he must confess that the scenes he had witnessed during the present session were very different from conduct pursued heretofore. He regretted this change very much indeed. But he must be permitted to remark, that unless some steps were taken to produce a change in the manner of conducting the business here, members might as well go home at once, for this state of things could not last much longer. It was not only a disgrace to themselves, but a disgrace to the country. Mr. U. then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the facts relative to the disorder and personal violence which has just taken place between two its members, to wit: RICE GARLAND and JESSE A. BYNUM, and that said committee report with all practicable despatch the facts of the case.

Mr. CONNER approved of the motion just made by the gentleman from Kentucky. It must be obvious to all that it was necessary to preserve order in the House; and he was in favor of an immediate investigation, and that censure should fall on the offender, whoever he might be. He had been an attentive observer for some time past; and he was sure that not only members, but visiters in the galleries, must have seen that something was necessary to preserve the order and dignity of the body. Those members who had been here more than two or three terms, could not but regret the sad change which had taken place in the mode of conducting the business of the House. Mr. C appealed to the recollection of the SPEAKER in relation to a former case of disturbance, not precisely like the present, but which, for the sake of preserving the credit of the House, had been quashed. But now the time had come when the most disgraceful language was used, not only in the under current, but openly, in the face of the House; and we had heard quite as much vulgarity and abuse as was ever heard at the tail of a cart, or at a militia muster in the district which he represented. In every legislative body, it was necessary that order, peace, and harmony, should be preserved; and he hoped that every lover of order would unite to keep down this turbulent spirit, which was ever calculated to disturb the harmony of their proceedings. The reputation of the House of Representatives of the United States was now measurably gone into disrepute, and from the course pursued it was no more than could be expected. What had been the mode of procedure for the last ten or fifteen days? Instead of attending to the questions before them, had it not been one continued attack on the high officers of our Government, who were charged with the grossest corruption? He did not stand there to vindicate those officers if they were in fault, but he stood there as the friend of order.

Mr. C. then alluded to a case which occurred some years ago, when the Secretary of the President of the United States was assaulted in the Rotundo by a printer. On that occasion a committee of investigation was appointed, and he well remembered the indignation expressed by members of all parties, and their readiness to resent it, although the individual was but the Secretary of the President. He also alluded to the instance when a member of Congress was attacked in the street, and said he believed that he was one of the twenty-five, who voted to take no notice of it, believing that the House had no cognizance. But he referred to it merely to show the feeling which existed on the subject. He also alluded to another instance when one night a rencontre was prevented between two members, by the interposition of their friends. But the evil was now increasing to an alarming extent, and with the gentleman from Kentucky, he would say that unless a stop was put to it immediately, Congress might as well adjourn forthwith, and members return to their constituents to inform them that they, their Representatives, were unable to do any business.

Mr. BANKS said he rose under the influence of feelings of a painful nature. He had been raised in that school which taught him to look on order and decorum in a public body like this, as essential to its dignity, and to the dignity of the people who sent them there. He could not look but with pain and mortification on the recent course of debate, in arraigning at the bar of the House members of a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, and exposing the private characters of individuals who had no opportunity to reply. He considered it undignified, and unparliamentary, in arraigning the high officers of Government, instead of attending to the legitimate business before them. But although gentlemen had thought proper to protract this debate, without attending to the business of the country, yet now he trusted they would pause, and that members of both parties would unite in preserving order.

Mr. B. then stated that he happened to be near the two gentleman at the time the rencontre occurred, and that, with others, he had lent his aid to separate them. He would say nothing now as to the cause which gave rise to the unfortunate disturbance; but he had risen for the purpose of entreating all parties to unite with him in preserving, in future, the dignity of the House, and thereby the dignity of the people of the United States. As regarded the present case, he hoped the House would act promptly, and that a committee would be raised at once to ascertain the facts which gave rise to the disgraceful scene, let the blame fall wherever it might. He was anxious for the adoption of any course for preserving the dignity of the House.

Mr. BRIGGS said we had now arrived at a point where we must stop. This system of vulgarity and abuse could be tolerated no longer. He was ashamed to say that in this body language was indulged, in which, for coarseness and vulgarity, could not be exceeded on the highway; and, as might be expected, such language had at last led to personal violence in the face of the House. He was convinced that members on both sides had felt disgraced by such proceedings, and were desirous of adopting a remedy; but they had suffered the evil to go on too long, until it had at length terminated in the most unhappy occurrence. But he would now call upon all to join with him, and from this moment to put shoulder to shoulder, and mind to mind, for the purpose of adopting a course that would elevate the House to the height from which it had fallen, and restore its dignity. It could be done, and must be done; otherwise all hopes of order would be gone. He hoped a committee would be appointed at once to investigate the unpleasant occurrence, and would make no further remarks until the facts had been investigated.

Mr. ANDREWS said he was a young member, but he hoped the House would excuse him when he gave his humble opinion that no good could arise from prolonging this debate. He hoped the gentlemen would consent to the immediate adoption of the resolution, and he therefore moved the previous question

The previous question was seconded and the main question having been ordered on the adoption of the resolution, the question was taken and the resolution was agreed to, and the following gentlemen were appointed to serve on the committee, viz: Messrs. UNDERWOOD, BUTLER of Ky. BRIGGS, COOPER of Ga. and CLIFFORD.

Mr. WISE hoped the committee would be directed to proceed at once, so that the matter might be disposed of to-day; and on his motion the committee was granted leave to sit during the session of the House.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. SALTONSTALL then resumed his remarks, and spoke in reference to the late war with Great Britain, and said that those who condemned it were contending for great principles; and whatever might have been their motives, they ought not to be misapprehended. At that time, war had ravaged Europe. It appeared that Napoleon was carrying all before him, and it seemed that he would concentrate all power; and it was conceived that we had more to fear from that movement than from any other. The minority in his State were opposed to the war, and he wished to state to the House the situation of the country at the time; and mentioned, among other reasons, that Napoleon was then on his march to Russia; that all Europe was making a combined movement; that our country was not prepared for war; and that all our commerce was exposed to the enemy.

Mr. S. said that his name had been read by his colleague [Mr. PARMENTER] in connection with the Hartford Convention, and he took the occasion to say that he, Mr. S. could add his testimony to that of Sherman, Otis, the secretary of the convention, and others, who were there present, that never was there a mention of a dissolution of the Union; and if there had been, it would have been looked upon with abhorrence. The Hartford Convention was regarded as odious; but as to its design, it was as innocent as the conventions recently held at Harrisburg and Columbus.

Mr. S. then proceeded to read the names of those associated with the convention, and eulogized them severally; and asked the gentleman from Maine [Mr. A. SMITH] a question in relation to Stephen Longfellow, jr.

Mr. A. SMITH replied that he knew Mr. Longfellow to be a high minded man; and would bear testimony to his undeviating consistency. Mr. L. was a Federalist, and is now a modern Whig.

Mr. STUART obtained the floor, and said that it was with great regret that he was induced to mingle in the discussion. The remarks which he should make, would be called from him by his colleague, [Mr. REYNOLDS,] who intended his remarks for Illinois. His (Mr. S's) also were intended for the same latitude. He did not intend to speak of the Hartford Convention, but on the subject of the Cumberland road, in reply to the remarks of his colleague. After going into a history of the proceedings on that bill, he said he did not hold either party in that House responsible for the defeat of the Cumberland road. Gentlemen belonging to both parties had voted for and against it. He went into an examination of the several votes which had taken place at this session, in support of the ground assumed. And also at the last session, he said, the bill was laid on the table, and that the larger portion of the Democratic party voted in the affirmative on that question. He censured the proper departments for not reporting to Congress the estimates for that road in the usual way; and hence he argued that the responsibility of the defeat of that measure rested with the President. He also adverted to certain votes given by Mr. Van Buren when in the Senate of the United States, to prove that the President was opposed to the road. He replied at some length to the remarks of his colleague, that the old Federal party had been merged into the present Whig party, and that their principles were identical. He had heard the same course of remark during the last summer from his political opponent. His colleague, also, had commenced the canvass in the southern district in Illinois, in the same way. All those who wished to delude the people, made use of the same kind of demagoguism. The old Federal party, as a party, he said, had been long since disbanded. He then adverted to the operations of the Sub-Treasury system; and argued that it would work injuriously to the interests of the West. He spoke at some length on various other topics. His remarks will be given hereafter.

Mr. JAMESON obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise; and, on dividing the committee on that motion, there were, ayes 53, noes 55: no quorum voting.

Mr. JONES demanded tellers for another count.

Mr. JAMESON said he had not expected to get the floor this evening, and was not well prepared to go on with his argument, and would much prefer that the committee would rise.

Messrs. BEIRNE, and DAVIES of Pennsylvania, having been appointed tellers, to take a count, reported that there were, ayes 69, noes 57; whereupon the committee rose.

Mr. DAVIES of Pennsylvania moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were, yeas 55, nays 87.

So the House refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. JAMESON resumed the floor and replied, at great length, to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STUART.] He said the stale stuff so often charged, and so often refuted, that Martin Van Buren was opposed to the war, and that he was the friend of Rufus King, he did not think worth consuming the time of the committee to reply to. It has been again and again refuted. In relation to the charge of the gentleman from Illinois, in relation to the Cumberland road, he would ask whether it would have been possible for Martin Van Buren to have escaped the denunciations and abuse of the Whig party by any course of action in relation to that road. If he had recommended it after the decisive expression of opinion against it by the last Congress, he would have been denounced by the greater portion of these same Whig gentlemen, because he had presumed to dictate to them a course of action different from that which the Legislative department had determined upon. Who gave the veto to the Cumberland road bill? The Congress of the United States. The President, in accordance with the settled practice of his predecessors, recommended this bill to the consideration of the previous and last sessions of Congress. But Congress formed a new precedent, and settled a new principle, by rejecting it; and now, forsooth, because the President had paid proper deference to the opinion expressed by the legislative branch of the Government, and did not recommend it, the Whig gentlemen who had been so clamorous against Executive dictation, will not vote for a measure because he will not dictate to them that it is right, and that they must vote for it. They are not willing to take the responsibility of legislating without Executive dictation. Last Congress took the responsibility to give the measure its death blow, and Mr. Van Buren pursued the course of his predecessors, and paid some respect to the expression of opinion by the last Congress. As the death blow was given by Congress, it was their duty to resuscitate. The Executive then, as in duty bound, will pursue your lead. Let it be revived by the same hands that killed it. But the measure was first diseased by the action of the Legislature of the State from which the gentleman [Mr. STUART] came. That body determined that the road should not pass through the State unless it passed a particular point. You then gave a death stroke to the road. The friends of it, falling out among themselves, weakened it; the enemies of the measure seized upon that circumstance and worked its ruin. It can be only revived again in forty-three or in fifty-three, under a new census. The gentleman had intimated that the measure was opposed in the message. Such was not the fact; it was silent upon the subject. Therefore the gentleman cannot draw either from the message, or from any thing that the President has said, that he is unfriendly to the road. He (Mr. J.) came to the conclusion, from the reading of that document, that the President would have been charged with dictation to Congress, if he had recommended it in his message. This party, which has declaimed so loud against Executive dictation, and charged the Democratic party with having been controlled by it, now come forward and say—in extenuation of their votes against this measure, and assent to and avow the Federal doctrine—that they will not take the responsibility of voting for a measure because they think the Executive is opposed to it. Therefore, that this Whig party is to be the tool of the President—that it will stoop so low to Executive power, that it will not do except what it is bid to do. If that odious doctrine was to obtain there, they had better go home. Just see what the Executive wants—do his bidding, without investigation, and go home. He did not, nor did the Democratic party, subscribe to that odious Federal doctrine. He believed the Legislative body should act independent of the Executive. Such was the principle of the Constitution. He argued that all the power emanated from and was concentrated in the people. They appointed the Senate and the Congress, and they were both responsible to that source of power. Each branch of the Government was independent of the other—they were made so by the Constitution—and all the powers were regulated and controlled by the Constitution and the laws. If the doctrine which has been contended for by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] that there was a dependence of one branch of the Government upon the other, or that Congress was to listen to the dictation of the Executive, Republican liberty could not long be maintained. The great fabric of our Government must soon topple and fall. The Executive, like Congress, was responsible to the people. The duties of the Executive are defined by the Constitution and the laws. They are different from those of the Legislative branch of the Government. It is the duty of the Legislative department to originate and pass measures, and the duty of the President to execute them. Yet the gentlemen of the Opposition complain because the President will not overstep the powers assigned to him, and assume to himself to recommend estimates for purposes which Congress had declared that it could not appropriate money to, they refuse to act for themselves, and vote against propositions that are brought forward for that purpose. They do this too to make a pretext for throwing the responsibility of the defeat of that measure upon the Executive. Mr. J. spoke at some length on various other topics, which will be published hereafter.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky obtained the floor, and offered a modification for the whole bill, proposing to graduate and reduce the salaries of the officers of Government in a certain ratio; also, to reduce the proposed appropriation to the contingent fund of the Senate from $50,000 to $30,000; and that of the House of Representatives from $100,000 to $75,000; and to reduce the miscellaneous appropriation from $67,000 to $30,000; with certain provisos.

Mr. D. said he was aware that the amendment was not then in order; but he merely wished to have it read to admonish the committee that the civil and diplomatic bill was before them. And having intimated his intention to confine himself to the subject under consideration, before proceeding further, yielded the floor to

Mr. OGLE, for a personal explanation, which he deemed necessary in consequence of the manner of the replies of his colleague [Mr. KEIM] and of Mr. JAMESON of Missouri, to the remarks made by him a few days ago. Mr. O. having gone into an argument, instead of making a personal explanation,

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama rose to a point of order. He inquired of the CHAIR whether it was in order for one gentleman, who had not spoken on the bill, to get the floor and yield it to another gentleman to make an argument, who had already spoken once, and thus deprive other gentlemen, who had not participated in the debate, of the privilege of speaking.

The CHAIR was understood to say that it would be in order if the gentleman confined himself to a personal explanation; but it would not be to make an argument.

Mr. OGLE again proceeded in his remarks, and was commenting on the qualities of the furniture in the President's House, when

Mr. SMITH of Maine inquired of the CHAIR whether, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeded in that course of remarks, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] would be entitled to the floor.

The CHAIR decided that he would not; and after a conversational debate, in which Messrs. SMITH of Maine, OGLE, DAVIS of Kentucky, DROMGOOLE, and LEET participated, Mr. OGLE was ruled out of order, and

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky claimed the floor, and was about proceeding in his remarks, when

Mr. RARIDEN moved that the committee rise.

Mr. VANDERPOEL having demanded tellers, and Messrs. HUBBARD and DAVIS of Pennsylvania having been appointed such, reported ayes 44, noes 74, no quorum voting.

The committee rose, and the CHAIR reported that fact to the House.

Mr. COOPER of Pa. moved an adjournment.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 50, nays 80. So the House refused to adjourn.

A quorum being present, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky resumed his remarks. He spoke at some length, and contended that the present Administration was the continuation of the same Administration which succeeded Mr. ADAMS, and promised the country retrenchment and reform, and that that promise had been violated, by an increase in the expenditures. Before concluding, he yielded the floor to

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama, on whose motion the committee rose; when,

On motion of Mr. GRINNELL,

The House (at half-past 11 o'clock at night) adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, April 22, 1840.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented a petition of citizens of Walker county, Georgia, and the adjoining counties, praying for the establishment of a post route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana, in favor of a general bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL presented a petition from citizens of New Jersey, praying the establishment of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which have been referred the various memorials on the subject of a general bankrupt law, reported a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. C. said it might be proper for him to state that there had been much diversity of opinion on the subject in the committee. A majority thought, indeed he might say they all thought, that some immediate relief should be provided for all those persons who have already, by the misfortune of trade, or by other means, failed in business, and become unable to meet their engagements, and to day their debts, and who are willing to make a full and fair surrender of their property for the benefit of their creditors; and not only for those who are at present laboring under this misfortune, but for all those who may hereafter be in a similar situation, and who may choose voluntarily to surrender their property, and avail themselves of the relief proposed. The bill now reported only provides for the case of voluntary bankruptcy. If passed, it will give a great, an almost immeasurable relief to thousands. It will emancipate from a species of bondage a vast number of active, intelligent, and enterprising men, who are now struggling against hope, with spirits worn down and energies paralyzed. It is not they only who are interested in the matter; the country has an interest in their activity, and industry, and talents, that they may be again set free to add to its general wealth and prosperity. These views operating with a majority of the committee, they thought it would be best to present this bill for the consideration of the Senate as unencumbered and unclogged by any other matter; that it should stand or fall by its own merits, and that it should not be entangled with other measures not essentially connected with it, and which might bring on a heated and angry party discussion, in which the merits of the relief now proposed might be lost sight of amid the more exciting and questionable matters improperly connected with it. The minority would not consent that this bill should be reported, unless it provided for the case of the compulsory bankruptcy of individuals, and also for the bankruptcy of corporations. As a compromise, the majority of the committee proposed that three bills should be reported, providing separately for the three classes of cases which the committee had under consideration, viz: 1, for the case of voluntary bankruptcy; 2, for the involuntary bankruptcy of individuals; and 3, for the case of corporations; leaving each member of the committee to vote on each bill in the Senate as he chose. The majority thought that this was the most fair method of proceeding, as each class would be debated, and voted for or against upon its own merits. This proposition was declined by the minority—they insisting on including corporations in any bill which might be reported. It is but just to say that, at the last meeting of the committee, when the proposition was finally rejected, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] was not present; but at a previous meeting he urged the propriety of inserting corporations in the bill.

Mr. C. said it might further be proper to state that two of the members of the majority were not inclined at present to go farther than the present bill goes. He (Mr. C) was not of that number; as he considered it the duty of Congress to pass a general bankrupt law, which should be equally favorable to the creditor as the debtor; by which creditors, seeing their debtor fraudulently disposing of and wasting his effects, could compel him to surrender them in payment of his debts. Such a law in a trading community was essentially necessary to its prosperity. In part discharge of the duty assigned to the the Committee on the Judiciary, he now reported the bill, reserving to the committee to consider whether they will report further on the subject.

Mr. WALL, after a few remarks that were not heard, observed that the minority of the committee dissented from that bill. They could not consent to report, as a uniform rule of bankruptcy, a system which applied itself altogether to debtors, and not to creditors—which applied to natural persons, and not to artificial. Nor could they conceive how the complication of the three branches of the subject, as mentioned by the Senator from Delaware, could produce any party excitement, or retard the progress of a measure which seemed to be so loudly called for by the country. With a view to present to the Senate the labors of the minority of the committee, he gave notice that he should move, when this bill was called up, to strike out all of it after the enacting clause, and to insert, in lieu of it, a bill which he now had the honor to submit, and move that it should be printed.

Mr. KING wished to know whether the bill reported by the honorable Senator from Delaware was predicated on the bills introduced by the Senators from Massachusetts and New York, [Messrs. WEBSTER and TALLMADGE.] and which had been referred to the Judiciary Committee, or upon the memorials which had been presented on the subject, and also referred to them.

Mr. CLAYTON replied that the two bills referred to by the Senator from Alabama had already been reported back to the Senate more than a week ago. The bill just reported was predicated on the various memorials on the subject that had been referred to the committee.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky begged leave to suggest to the members of the Judiciary Committee, charged with this subject, whether it would not be better to make the bill the order of the day for some convenient day, so as to let all the Senators present, as well as absent, know when it would be taken up for consideration. Whilst up, he would take occasion to express his hearty concurrence with the course the committee pursued. There were three distinct subjects which the committee mentioned as properly appertaining to a general system of bankruptcy. These were voluntary bankruptcy, where the debtor himself should apply for relief; involuntary bankruptcy, where the creditors should apply for a settlement of their debtor's affairs; and, lastly, the bankruptcy of corporations. Now these three subjects were certainly separate and distinct in their nature, and might be well considered in three separate and distinct bills. It must be concurred by the Senate that the voluntary class would embrace a vast majority of the cases, and that the bill on that branch of the subject would afford the greatest measure of relief to the country. He would not, however, pursue this subject, having risen only for the purpose of suggesting to the members of the Judiciary Committee the expediency of assigning some convenient day for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WALL said, that the committee had reflected on this subject, and were disposed to ask the Senate that the bill might be made the order of the day for next Monday week; but on further reflection, on account of the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] they had concluded not to move to make the bill a special order, until the arrival of these gentlemen.

On motion by Mr. GRUNDY, the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated land within the same," passed the 18th day of April, 1806, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. LUMPKIN,

The bill for the relief of Avery, Saltmarsh and Company, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and after a debate, in which the bill was supported by Messrs. LUMPKIN, CLAY of Alabama, and KING, and opposed by Messrs. HUBBARD, TAPPAN, and CALHOUN, it was ordered to be engrossed by a vote of 16 to 13.

DUTIES AND DRAWBACKS ON SUGAR, SALT, AND MOLASSES: REPEAL OF THE SALT TAX AND OF THE FISHING BOUNTIES AND ALLOWANCES.

The bill to reduce the drawbacks on refined sugars and distilled rum exported, in proportion to the reductions of duty on the imported sugar and molasses out of which they were manufactured, and to reduce the fishing bounties and allowances in proportion to the reduction of the salt duty on which they were founded, being the special order, was taken up, and, having been read—

Mr. BENTON rose and said, that the object of the bill was to correct the errors of previous legislation, and especially of the compromise act of 1833; errors by which the Constitution was undergoing a daily violation—the Treasury was suffering a daily loss of money unjustly drawn from it—and the end of which would be, if not arrested, to turn over the whole amount of the revenue from sugar, salt, and molasses, to the rum distillers, the sugar refiners, and the Northeastern fishermen.

Mr. B. said that when the compromise act was on its gallop through this chamber—that act which adjourned the tariff question to the year 1842—adjourned it from a time when it was ready for settlement, to a time when no one will be thinking of it—to a time when the South especially will be sound asleep upon the subject; when that act was on its gallop through this chamber, he had endeavored to prevent the evils which it was the object of this bill to arrest; and for that purpose had offered an amendment, which, not coming from one of the contracting parties to the compromise, was not allowed to be adopted. That amendment was in these words:

"That all drawbacks allowed on the exportation of articles manufactured in the United States, from materials imported from foreign countries, and subject to duty, shall be reduced in proportion to the reduction of duties provided for in this act."

Such was the amendment which he offered. It was self-evidently just and proper; it was right and proper on its own face; yet it was rejected, and notoriously rejected, because the bill had been arranged out of doors, and was not to be amended in the House except upon the consent of its authors. The vote of rejection was 24 to 18; and I am perfectly aware that what was difficult to be done then is more difficult now; that those who have profited by our erroneous legislation, and still wish to profit from it, constitute a powerful obstacle to our legislation; that an immense speculation is in progress, founded on these errors in our legislation; and the doctrine of vested rights now seems to extend to all the errors and mistakes, as well as to all the abuses, of legislation. The sugar refiners—the rum distillers—the Northeastern fishermen—stand together to defend the advantages they have gained. Not content with the vast sums which they have already unduly obtained from our Treasury, the fruit of our vicious legislation, they become more insatiate in proportion to the amount they have received, and now boldly resist, as an invasion of their rights, any attempt to correct our own errors; and these refiners attack with abuse and personalities the member of Congress who ventures to do his duty to his country, and to attempt the redress of a public wrong.

The abuse of the sugar drawback commenced in 1829. It commenced in the act of January of that year, which increased the drawback from four cents to five cents a pound. I opposed that increase at the time, and foretold its injurious effect on our Treasury, and on our domestic sugar. I then foretold that that increase of drawback would vastly augment the importation of foreign sugars, to the prejudice of our own; that it would discourage the use of our domestic sugar for refining; that it would establish vast manufactories in our country to refine, not domestic, but foreign sugars; and that it would cause immense exportations of this article for the mere benefit of the drawback, the one-fifth part of which would be a mere gratuity from the Treasury. This is what I said in December, 1828, when the bill for the increased drawback was on its passage in this chamber; and all the evils which I then foresaw and denounced, were in a state of sufficiently rapid development when the compromise act of 1833 came into life, and aggravated tenfold the evils of the act of 1829. By this compromise act, the almost incredible, and certainly unparalleled error was committed, of reducing duties without reducing the drawbacks founded upon them; an error which has had the direct effect of going at once to the ne plus ultra of the protective system, that of granting bounties out of the Treasury; a species of protection, which General Hamilton failed to establish in 1791, and which then, and ever since, has been admitted to be as flagrantly unconstitutional as it is grossly unjust to the community. The compromise act has established this species of protection, and now let us see its operation in relation to refined sugar; and now let us see its effect in stimulating the importation of foreign sugars, increasing the exportation of refined sugars, and increasing the amount of drawback from the Treasury. These results are seen in the Treasury returns, which have been communicated to the Senate, and printed by its order. Taking these returns from the year 1828–9, when the erroneous legislation in relation to sugar first begun, and the successive importation are:

Year.	Brown. Pounds.	White, clayed, &c. Pounds.
1828	51,686 955	5,249,006
1829	58,597,574	4 709,720
1830	76,576,388	7,906,658
1831	98,576,928	10,437,726
1832	60,117,717	6,334,571
1833	85,689,044	11,999 088
1834	107,483,841	7,966,014
1835	111,806,880	14,229 359
1836	181,243,537	10,182 578
1837	120.416 071	15,723,748
1838	139,200,905	14,678,238

Here is an increase of near three to one in about ten years; an increase which is beyond all proportion to the increased population and commerce of the country; an increase which has not been affected by the panics and distresses at home, and which is upwards of twice as great in the ruinous years of 1837 and 1838, as it was in the year 1832, when the Bank of the United States was in the zenith of its power and glory. Such an increase is unnatural and factitious, and announces the existence of some occult cause to stimulate and extend this branch of business beyond its proper bounds; while so many other branches of industry have been suffering from the bank suspensions, and the artificial and political panics and alarms with which the country has been afflicted. Such an increase, under such circumstances, announces the existence of some secret stimulus; and that stimulus is found in the vicious legislation of Congress in 1829 and 1833.

The increased exportation of refined sugars, and the increased amount of drawback upon them, have gone steadily forward, and with gigantic strides, since the compromise act has began to take fuller effect. In five years—from 1835 to 1839—these annual increases are:

Years.	Pounds exported.	Drawback.
1835,	856, 590	$42,329
1536,	1 675 372	83,768
1837,	2 012,854	100 642
1838,	2 909 886	145,494
1839,	5,026,027	251,301

Here is an increase of sixfold in five years; an increase of upwards of 100 per centum annually, for five years in succession; and these five years covering two bank suspensions, divers panics, and repeated jeremiads over the universal ruin produced by this wicked and worthless Administration. Surely it will be admitted that there are some exceptions to this universal ruin; that the sugar refiners at least are doing well; and are likely to do so long as our compromise act remains in force.

Strongly as this table presents the question, there is a still stronger view of it to be presented: it is the table of the amounts of drawback paid on these refined sugars for fifteen years, and by which it will be seen that, previous to the erroneous legislation of 1828, these drawbacks vibrated from $1,600 to $5,800; that immediately upon the passage of that act they rose as high as $45,000 and $84,000; and that on the passage of the compromise act in 1833, they took another rise, and have run up to $251,301. Here is the table of these astonishing increases, the mere view of which announces the existence of great errors in our legislation:

Years.	Amount.
1825	$1,612 68
1826	2,627 57
1827	5,834 36
1828	2 045 48
1829	45,092 56
1830	84,230 48
1831	63 688 65
1832	42,840 65
1833	34.643 80
1834	162 086 05
1835	42,829 50
1836	83,768 60
1837	100,642 70
1838	145,494 30
1839	251,301 35

Such is the increase of the drawbacks on refined sugars in the short space of fifteen years; I may say ten years; for the increase began with the erroneous law of 1829. The table proves the error; but it is not the only proof to that effect. A letter from the deputy collector of Philadelphia, Document No 334, attests the fact, and that in relation both to sugars and fish, he says:

"Under the act of January 21, 1829, the bounty, drawback, or allowance, is at five cents per pound, and no more. As there is no excise paid by the refiners, the allowance of five cents per pound was, in 1829, considered as equivalent to the amount of duties paid on two pounds of brown sugar at 2½ cents per pound, the duty payable on the same at the time of passing the act. The duties now are less by the excess under the act of 1832, and yet the drawback or bounty on the sugar is the same. It is so with bounty on pickled fish of the fisheries of the United States. When 20 cents per barrel was allowed, it was to drawback the duty paid on a bushel of salt, supposed to be used in curing a barrel of fish. Now the duty is less than 10 cents by the excess, yet the bounty remains at 20 cents, which is for more than two bushels of salt."

He also says:

"The quantity of refined sugar exported in 1839, (last year,) at this port. was 394,784 pounds, which, at 5 cents per pound, made $19,239 20 as a drawback. This far excee ds any amount paid for many years. In looking over our accounts from 1824 to 1838, inclusive, the highest amount does not exceed $2,600—say in 1836."

And he says further:

"I understand that large quantities of refined sugar will be exported from hence, and probably from other ports of the United States. I think the term sugar refined rather vague. Some of the refiners are of opinion that all sugars melted and properly clarified, and freed from all extraneous substances, may be considered as refined—that bastard sugar is refined sugar. I must confess that there is some plausibility in this, and it should be guarded against by the Legislature; for, although the bastard sugar is nothing more than the sugar-house white and brown sugars, yet it has gone through the same operation as the loaf and lump sugar, the only difference consisting in the last process of claying; but it is an inferior sugar—far inferior to a good muscavado in strength. I think the bounty, if allowed at all, should be on refined loaf and lump sugar; and, if the privilege of crushing the loaves or lumps is given, the crushing should be done in the presence of an inspector. The object of crushing can only be for the pupose of saving freight, to which there might be no objection, if done under proper inspection."

Finally, he says:

"I will, however, recall to your recollection a circumstance which occurred in this office. Mr. Canby invited you to call at his establishment in Church alley, several years ago, to see his process of refining, but refused to permit me to accompany you. In the course of conversation, the question arose as to the quantity of raw sugar necessary to make one pound of refined sugar. He stated that his brother thought that the bounty should be on 2½ pounds of raw, but his own opinion was that 2½ pounds were ample; the duty then was 2½ cents per pound, while I thought that an average of 2 pounds would be enough."

Adding this testimony of the deputy collector to the pregnant evidence of the tables, and the conclusion becomes irresistible, that enormous drawbacks are unduly drawn from the Treasury—that they are still increasing—that they are paid even on bastard sugar—and that there must be an error of half a pound of brown sugar in every pound of it refined.

Of the $251 000 drawn from the Treasury last year, I consider $150,000 to have been unduly and unjustly drawn. I do not say illegally, because our miserable laws authorized it. I consider three-fifths of the whole to be a naked gratuity—a mere bounty—a simple present from our Treasury; and I make up that sum thus: The act of 1829 added one fifth to the drawback, which drawback was sufficient before: this would give an error of $50,000 in $250,000. The act of 1833 has nearly reduced the duty on sugar one half, which should have reduced the drawback also near one half: this would take near $100,000 from the remaining $200.000. This gives a total loss to the Treasury in 1839 of near $150,000; a sum great in itself, but a mere trifle to what it is to be in 1841 and 1842, if the evil is not arrested. It is then that the duties go down to twenty per centum on the value, which will be little more than half a cent a pound on brown sugar, while the drawback is to remain at five cents a pound! This is a folly of which there is no example in the annals of legislation. It may safely be asserted that the legislative history of the world furnishes no instance of such careless and reckless and unjust legislation. But bad as it is—great as the loss to the Treasury already is—yet we are only at the beginning of it. The great harvest for the refiners is still ahead—it is in the years 1841 and 1842—when the compromise shall have reduced the sugar duty to half a cent, and left the drawback at five cents. Then the harvest takes place; and surely these two years will more than absorb the whole sugar revenue, and exhibit the spectacle of seventeen millions of people taxed in an article of universal consumption, in order to make a gracious present—a gratuitous gift—of the whole amount of the tax to some thirty-odd sugar refiners! Two years of such work will be able to clear princely fortunes; and it is highly probable that the most reasonable of the refiners will be willing for Congress to amend its law after that time. The game will be in their own hands; and two years of such work as they can perform, ought to satisfy the most greedy and voracious. A bounty, and a monopoly, at once in their favor! Five cents drawback on refined sugar; less than one cent duty on brown sugar; the treacle, syrup and sugar molasses all clear; a duty on foreign refined sugar, which excluds it from our market; the exclusive supply of the home market at their own price; drawbacks all payable in thirty days in solid money; hundreds of millions of pounds of brown sugar rapidly imported, converted by steam power into bastard or refined sugar, and exported at five cents a pound out of the Treasury: such is the fruit of our legislation—such the prospect before us—such the prize for which the refiners come here to contend—and such the mischiefs against which, solitary and alone, I raise my feeble and unavailing voice.

Mr. B. said he could not take leave of this topic of sugars, without noticing a paper which had been communicated to the Senate, and printed by its order; it was a letter from several sugar refiners in the city of New York, addressed to a member of this body, [Mr. WEBSTER.] The letter selected an expression from a former speech of his—the one he made, on asking leave to bring in this bill—and very clearly proved that expression to be erroneous. I then said the amount already paid to the sugar refiners for their drawback exceeded the whole amount of the sugar revenue, and that seventeen millions of people were now taxed on their sugar to turn over the whole amount of the proceeds of the tax to a few dozen sugar refiners. This was an error; but an error in time only. Instead of now receiving the whole amount of the sugar revenue, which they do not, these refiners will so receive it about two years hence! It is an error of two years; an error which has no effect upon the character of the bill, or the necessity of passing it. The truth is, that the duty on sugar going down—the exportation of refined sugars enormously increasing—and the drawback remaining stationary, the result is clear that the drawback will exceed the revenue when the duty reaches its minimum in 1842. This is clear; but whether the drawback should ever exceed the duty, is perfectly immaterial to the question of passing this bill. The amount of duty which they have paid in, is all that the refiners have a right to draw back. They have no right to a cent beyond the amount they pay in. The whole point of my speech was to show that they received more than they paid; this they do not deny, and cannot deny. No man upon earth can deny it. Whether they now receive the whole amount of the sugar revenue, which they do not, or shall so receive it after 1842, which they will, is perfectly immaterial to the point of the debate, or the character of the bill, or the necessity of passing it. And here I will make the remark, that these refiners, by taking the trouble to show this error in my speech, and showing none but this, admit the correctness of the remainder. They admit the enormous increase in the amount which they draw from the Treasury, and which has risen from $42,000 to $251,000 in five years. They admit that they receive more than they pay—that they draw back out of the Treasury more than they put into it—and this is the sole point in the case. It is the sole question upon which the passage of this bill should depend. Thus by attacking an immaterial part of my speech, and leaving the material parts unanswered, they admit the truth of all that is material. And more: by attacking this statement, which I had myself long since corrected—by attacking this, and leaving unnoticed the letter of the deputy collector of Philadelphia, they admit all his most essential statements in relation to bastard sugars, crushed sugars, increasing drawbacks, excess of drawbacks over duties, and the false basis of two and a half, or even two and a quarter, pounds of brown sugar to make one pound of refined. All this they admit by not denying it, while denying an immaterial statement, erroneous only as to time.

So much for the sugar drawbacks; now for the rum and molasses. On this head I will be brief, because the question is less complex, and also less in amount than that of the sugar drawback, and derives its abuse from only one law. No act previous to the compromise gave any undue advantage to the rum distiller; it is that act alone which, by reducing the duty on molasses, without reducing it on the rum distilled from it and exported; it is this act which does all the mischief in this case; and its effect will be seen in the rapid increase of the quantity of rum exported, and the amount of drawback paid, since the act began to operate largely upon the reduction of duty. In the last four years these quantities and amounts stand thus:

Years.	Gallons exported.	Drawback paid.
1836	75,271	$1,010
1837	116,588	4,663
1838	214,742	8 589
1839	356,699	14,267

Such are the results in four years under the stimulating bounty of the compromise act. An increase of four fold in four years! An annual average increase of more than one hundred per centum in four years of great embarrassment and much general decline in other business. Surely the rum distillers have not felt the distress of the times; surely they ought not to join distress meetings, and sign panic petitions; nor cheer the orations of alarm orators. An increase of fourfold in four years is a fine improvement in any business, and in the best of times; in the present time it is wonderful; but it is only a foretaste of what is to come. With the rum distillers, as with the sugar refiners, the harvest is still ahead! The years 1841 and 1842 are to be the glorious era of the rum business. Then the molasses duty will go down to less than one cent on the gallon; the drawback will remain at four cents; a gallon of one will make near a gallon of the other; and if the hard times continue, and the banks choose to sink the price of corn and rye a little lower, then the whole drawback can be cleared by substituting whiskey for molasses in the rum distillery. This is what can be done, and probably will be done; for the temptation will be too great to be resisted. But, take it either way, and the effect will be about the same to the Treasury. The reduction of the molasses duty in 1841 and 1842, to almost nothing, while the drawback on rum remains at four cents a gallon, must stimulate the exportation of rum, and increase the total drawback to an amount above the total revenue derived from molasses. Then will be seen the same spectacle in the case of molasses, which will be seen in the case of sugar—a whole nation taxed for the benefit of a few individuals! The molasses revenue will not be sufficient, after 1842, to pay the drawback founded upon it. Seventeen millions of people will then be taxed on their molasses for the benefit of some hundred rum distillers; and this the effect of a law which was not allowed to be amended when on its passage through this chamber; and which now, claiming a pre-eminence over all other laws, and setting up a title to sanctity, is called sacred and inviolable, and not to be touched by the hand of legislation!

Mr. B. proceeded to the third clause in the bill, that which related to the reduction of the fishing bounties and allowances; and said that he was here met by a preliminary question—by a question of fact—whether the fishing bounties and allowances were founded upon the salt duties, and ought to rise and fall with the increase or reduction of that duty? I am met, said Mr. B. by this question; and having been met by it, I deemed it my duty to apply to the Senate for a committee to examine the laws and documents which apply to it, and to make a report upon the whole subject to the Senate. That committee has obeyed the order of the Senate: it has discharged its duty. It has made a report going back to the year 1789, and tracing the question through all its changes and bearings from that day to this; and have demonstrated, as they believe, that the fishing bounties and allowances rest upon the salt duty, and nothing but the salt duty; that they are the commutation and equivalent for the drawback of the duty paid on the salt used in curing that part of the cod and mackerel fish which are exported to foreign countries; and, consequently, ought to be reduced in proportion to the reduction of the duties on salt. In support of this opinion, the committee have collected a mass of laws and facts which I hold to be conclusive and irresistible. Their report has been printed, and lies on the tables of members; and, until its doctrines are impugned or controverted, I deem it unnecessary, in this chamber, to repeat or enforce them. Referring Senators then to the legal and documentary history of these bounties and allowances, as traced in that report from the year 1789, and relying upon its evidence to carry conviction to the minds of all who shall read it, I pass to some opinions on the subject which have fallen into my hands since it was written—which were written cotemporaneously with the report, and which are entitled to peculiar weight because they come from an important city in the fishing district, and where the reduction of these bounties and allowances are made a subject of much contestation. I speak of the New Hampshire Gazette, and the editorial article which it contains under date of the 9 h inst. The paper itself is the oldest Democratic paper in the State; its editor, Mr. Greenleaf, is a gentleman of great candor and intelligence; and his opinions and conclusions, written simultaneously with the committee's report, and at the distance of five hundred miles from this city, are precisely the same which the committee have presented. After saying something in relation to the excitement endeavored to be got up against Dr. Moriarty, the surveyor of the port at Gloucester, Mass for some communication in relation to the fisheries, he says:

"We know nothing of Dr. Moriarty's opinions in relation to the repeal of the salt tax, and the system of bounties and allowances; but in our humble opinion all Democrats ought to be in favor of this repeal. Whatever other arguments may have been used in the original adoption of the bounty system—whatever may have been urged in its favor in regard to the usefulness of the fisheries, and their forming a nursery for seamen—it is manifestly founded on the salt duty; and but for the consideration that the fisheries were the great source of revenue derived from the salt tax, the bounty system could never have been established. The very conditions annexed to this bounty, establish this fact beyond dispute. * * * * * If the bounty rested on considerations in spendent of the salt duty, and these considerations were the encouragement of the fisheries, on the principle that they form a nursery for seamen, to be transferred to our navy, why was it not extended to merchantmen on foreign voyages? And why not to the hardy sailor on every branch of trade throughout our extensive seacoast? Are not these, also, nurseries for seamen even more extensive than those of our fisheries, which, in case of war, may be transferred to our navy? And why not pamper the farmer, also, with a system of bounties, who rears up in the field the most hardy and efficient race of men to fill the ranks of our armies? * * * * * We protest against the injustice of bestowing bounties in the absence of any sort of tax to be pleaded as an offset: and we, in like manner, protest against continuing a tax, not needed, on an article indispensable to the whole community, for the special purpose of perpetuating a system of bounties to one class, which is confessedly, by the operation of the reduction of the tariff, under the compromise act, very shortly to prove greater than the tax itself. * * * * * * By the operation of the compromise act, (of which Mr. Clay has claimed the paternity,) the Treasury is now suffering under a system of bounties, drawbacks, and protections, which, if not already the case, must shortly prove a drain upon the Treasury greater than will be counterbalanced by the duties paid. No provision was made for a corresponding reduction in drawbacks, bounties, and allowances, in that act for the gradual reduction of the tariff. The Government, therefore, has been obliged to pay these in the same manner as when the highest rate of duties existed, while the tariff of duties has suffered an annual reduction of ten per centum on all the excess above twenty per centum on the value. * * * * * But the time has come when this subject should be probed to the bottom. The system of bounties should rest on its true foundation, to wit: the tax; and if it cannot be abolished at a period when, by a reduction of the duties, the bounties bid fair to exceed the amount of the tax, we may indeed despair of the Republic, and give it up as a prey to a ravenous system of exclusive monopolies, bounties, and protection."

Such are the sentiments (continued Mr. B.) of an enlightend and patriotic editor, living in a town which is itself a seat of the fisheries, and where twenty thousand dollars of annual bounty are paid. His sentiments are as just as they are disinterested, and will become the unanimous sentiment of the country. Truth is powerful, and will prevail. Arguments to the judgment, and to the moral sense, of an enlightened community, never fail of their effect. They soon put to flight the arguments addressed to ignorance, to cupidity, and to faction. And here I shall drop this branch of the argument, barely remarking that my colleague on the Select Committee on the Fisheries, [Mr. ANDERSON of Tennessee,] will reply to the arguments of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] contained in his minority report; and that, at a convenient season, I will also say something in reply to it. At this time, as that gentleman is not present, we will not say a word in relation to his report.

I now proceed to show the injury to the Treasury already sustained from the failure of the laws to reduce the bounties and allowances to the fisheries in proportion to the reductions of the salt duty on which they are founded. These reductions of duty began in the year 1830, and were, for that year, a reduction of 5 cents on the bushel, or a reduction of one-fourth; for the year 1831, the reduction was 10 cents, or the one-half; since the compromise act of 1833, the reduction has undergone further periodical reductions, and may now be at about 6 cents to the bushel, or the one-third of their original amount. It is clear that the bounties and allowances should have been reduced in the same proportion during all this time: instead of that, they have been paid in full; and this table of the amounts actually paid, and of the amounts which should have been paid, exhibits the annual loss to the Treasury:

Years.	Amounts paid.	Amounts which should have been.
1830	$206,715	$151,425
1831	213,894	101,947
1832	234,137	117,068
1833	258,466	129,233
1834	229 070	114 535
1835	233 321	116,165
1836	219,822	104,961
1837	257,541	118 720
1838	319,149	106 574

The aggregate loss to the Treasury from 1830 to 1838—the last year to which the accounts have been made up—is about one million. This is a large sum for the Treasury to lose, by a single drain in nine years; but henceforth it is to be much larger. The loss for the present year, and for 1839—assuming that of 1838 as the basis of the calculation—will be about $212,000 for each year. But in 1841, and 1842, when the duty has sunk to its minimum under the compromise act, the whole amount of the salt revenue will be unequal to the payment of these bounties and allowances. They will not only absorb the whole revenue from that article, but will require above $100,000 to be taken from other branches of the revenue to make good the deficiency! The spectacle will then be exhibited of a population of seventeen millions of people taxed in an article of prime necessity, and universal consumption, not to support the Government, or to pay the debts of the Union, or for any purpose known to the Constitution, but for the benefit of a single class of persons already enjoying a monopoly of the American market for fish, and proved, by their own returns, to be doing a better business than any other branch of industry, and to be actuallily improving, while so many other branches of business are declining.

Mr. B. here referred to the Massacuusetts return of her fisheries, to show that this branch of business was doing well, and that it was not dependent upon national bounties to keep it alive. He showed that the cod and whale fishery yielded upon an average one hundred per centum on the capital employed in it during the fishing season of four months, and that each hand, for that short time, divided from $300 to $500; and he argued that this was an infinite'y better reward for labor than agriculturists received in any part of the Union; and therefore, that it was unjust to tax the community to give a bounty to them. He also showed, from the annually increas ng amount of the bounty paid, that it was an improving and thriving business. Upon these facts he argued against the gross injustice, as well as the utter unconstitutionality of doling out bounties from the Treasury to these fisheri s under the pretence of refunding to them a salt duty, when all the other fisheries, and the beef and provision curers, and all the Union besides, paid this duty in full, and received no drawback.

Mr. B. said the bill which he had brought in to reduce all the drawbacks—the refined sugar, the rum, and the fishing bounties and allowances—in proportion to the reduction of the duties on which they depended, was a bill self-evidently just and proper, and one which justice, law, and the Constitution, required to pass. The loss to the Treasury, from the three sources, must exceed $300,000 this year. After 1842, this loss, if the present bill is not passed, must exceed a million of dollars per annum. In other words, the people of the United States are to be taxed in their sugar, salt, and molasses, to the amount of $300.000 this year, and to the amount of a million in one or two years hence, for the mere benefit of a few dozen sugar refiners, a few hundred rum distillers, and a few thousand fishermen; each and all of which are proved to be doing a profitable business, and a thriving business, while almost every other branch of industry is suffering under the pressure and distress which the political, the gambling, and the insolvent part of the banks, have brought upon the country.

Mr. B. concluded his remarks with repeating the sentiment of the Editor of the New Hampshire Gazette, and applying it to the refined sugar and rum drawback as well as to the fishing bounties and allowances, that the time had come when these subjects should be probed to the bottom—when eac should be reduced in proportion to the reduce duty on which it rested—and when, if this canno be done, we may despair of the Republic, and give it up as a prey to a ravenous system of exclusive bounties, monopolies, and protection. Mr. B here offered an amendment proposing the total repeal of the salt duty, and supported it at length. His remarks will be published as soon as they are written out.

Mr. ANDERSON observed that he did not rise to make a speech, but simply to say that he concurred entirely in the views presented by the distinguished Senator from Missouri. The amendment which that gentleman had offered to the bill now upon the table, opened a very wide field of discussion: it opened the investigation of interests that were perhaps in some respects of sectional character, and in which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] now absent, took a deep interest. It would be remembered by the Senate, that the subject was presented to its consideration by the reports of the majority and minority of the Select Committee recently appointed to consider it, and that the minority report was drawn up by the Senator from Massachusetts who was now absent. He was, therefore, gratified that the Senator from Missouri propo ed to pass over it in order to wait the return of the Senator from Massachusetts, who, he presumed, intended to express his views on the subject. It was but an act of courtesy to wait this gentleman's return before taking up the bill for consideration; and when that opportunity should be offered, he should take occasion, as a member of the committee, to express his views also in relation to the interests it involved.

Mr. HUBBARD observed that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. ANDERSON] had truly remarked that reports on this subject had been presented by the majority as well as the minority of the committee; but it must be remembered that the Committee on Finance, in their report on the subject, had recommended that no action with regard to it should be had at the present session of Congress. He did expect, however, that the Senators from Missouri and Massachusetts [Messrs. BENTON and DAVIS] would express their views on it, and that then the subject would be permitted to rest. He calculated that these reports would go out silently to the community, and that, after their constituents had well considered the matter, members would come here better prepared to act at the next session. He was not before aware that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] intended to bring this question before the Senate at the present session for the purpose of having it fully debated. Such now he understood was his intention; and he also understood that such was the intention of the Senator from Tennessee. It was proper, therefore, that all the Senators should know it, in order that they might he prepared to meet the discussion. It was certainly not the intention of the Committee on Finance that this subject should be again brought up at the present session. For his part, he preferred that the people of the country should have full information on it before it was acted on, and that they should come prepared to discuss it at the next session, with a full knowledge of their views.

Mr. ANDERSON said he did not suppose that any thing he said would be misunderstood, or that his friend from New Hampshire had misunderstood him. It was the object of the Senator from Missouri, as well as his, that this bill should be taken up for discussion, and to express their views in relation to it. But as it was supposed that the Senator from Massachusetts took a deep interest in it, as he had made a report widely different from the bill, they deemed it but courteous to wait his return.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, April 22, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order, during the morning hour, was the resolution reported from the Committee on the Public Expenditures, by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS,] proposing to abolish that committee on the ground that the duties of that committee had been transferred to other committees.

Mr. LEET of Pennsylvania, said, he desired briefly to enter his humble protest against the adoption of the resolution now under consideration. Whatever some honorable gentlemen might think, in regard to it, in his opinion it involved topics and principles intimately connected with the vast expenditures of this great nation, worthy of grave and serious reflection. He came, said Mr. L. into this discussion; he ventured to take an humble part, in no spirit of complaint, and with no inclination whatever, so far as he knew himself, to find fault with, or to deal out censure upon, the honorable gentlemen who compose the committee, a majority of whom, as he understood, agreed to report this resolution to the House. Since the attention of the House had been invited to this subject by his honorable friend from Mass. [Mr. BRIGGS,] chairman of the Committee of Public Expenditures, a gentleman whom he was proud to call his personal friend, he had been induced to look into it, not with a political view, but with an eye to the present and future interests of the country, and he had come to the conclusion that the committee in question should not be abolished, and that the position assumed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] was sound and judicious. What, sir, said Mr. L. has it been left for the House of Representatives of the people of these United States, in the year 1840, to abolish one of its most important investigating committees? Can we reconcile such a thing to a just sense of duty to ourselves and the people? Although he did not deem it necessary, for the legitimate purposes of the argument, to trace minutely the history of this committee, from its original establishment to the present period, yet it may be well to say that it was created in 1814, during the second term of President Madison's administration. What was the reason of the rule, under which it was raised? What sort of necessity induced the Congress of that day to constitute this committee? Sir, the condition of affairs of State at that period rendered this committee proper. The receipts from revenue, taken together with those derived from loans, amounted to thirty or forty millions. It will be remembered the Government then had the heavy expenses of a war to bear. The House of Representatives being responsible, in a great degree, for all moneys that were appropriated, acted wisely and just, as I am willing to suppose the present House would, was this a new question, in raising a Committee of Public Expenditures, whose duty, in the comprehensive language of the rule, is "to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the Departments and the accountability of their officers."

Do not equally cogent reasons for its existence obtain, now as did in 1814? True it is, that the national incomes have varied from year to year—sometimes greater, and sometimes less; but your receipts from the sales of lands and from customs have, within late years, swelled the sums in your Treasury to very large amounts.

Mr. L. said, he was willing to concede that the gentlemen who advocated this resolution had plausibility on their side. It was argued, with a great degree of ingenuity and speciousness, that the rule defining the powers and duties of this committee had been in effect repealed, and that the duties had been transferred to, and distributed among, six other committees on expenditures in the several departments of the Government, which were created and added to the list of standing committees on the 30th of March, 1816. This being the case, it is contended the Committee on Public Expenditures has nothing to do, and therefore is unnecessary, and ought to be abolished. And in this view of the matter, continued Mr. L. the honorable gentlemen are helped along by a note in the volume of Rules, the authority of which he by no means admitted. What right had the compiler of the rules of this House, which always adopts and enacts rules for its own government at the beginning of every Congress, to pronounce sentence against the powers of the Committee on Public Expenditures? Give this note all the weight that can at all fairly attach to it, and it amounts to nothing more than the opinion of a gentleman who collected together the rules of the House. It cannot well be supposed, said Mr. L. that Congress, in 1816, when the six committees on accounts and expenditures were raised, intended to do away with the Committee on Public Expenditures. I, for one, will not attribute to them any such purpose. I can see no reason for doing so. If such was their meaning and design, why not say so in terms. There being no express repeal of the rule under which the Committee on Public Expenditures act, and from which are derived their great powers, I contend, said Mr. L. it is a fair and legitimate inference, that Congress never intended to abrogate it.

In the few additional remarks which he designed making, he begged leave to advert to some of the arguments urged by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HALL] The committee, of which the honorable gentleman is a member, at the present session, has from time to time reported in former years. The committee being, in successive Congresses, made up of different gentlemen, they took, it seems, different views of their powers and duties. Their several reports were rather in derogation of their powers. From this course of the committee, in times gone by, it is contended that it has always heretofore been considered doubtful whether or not it had any thing to do. But, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. L. did those former committees ever make any investigations? Did they ever examine into any of the departments, or any of the various branches of the departments? They never did, so far as I am informed.

But, sir, as to these reports, touching their own powers. What was done with them? What action was taken by the House? Were they considered, debated, and adopted? No. Of course, then, they cannot be regarded as authoritative. They are good evidence, it is true, of the various opinions of honorable and experienced gentlemen in regard to the powers of this committee; but nothing more. These opinions, thus expressed in the form of reports, are certainly entitled to great consideration, and receive it, too, at my hands. So far, however, as the action of this House is concerned, I contend, said Mr. L. that it goes far to sustain the position, that the rule raising the Committee on Public Expenditures still exists in full force. Mr. L. continued and said, that there were not only shades of difference, but really material and substantial differences in the powers of this committee and the six committees on expenditures in the Departments. The powers of this committee are more extensive than those of either of the six Department committees; and are coequal with those of all the six Department committees combined. The language of the 71st rule is, it shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Expenditures to examine into the "state" of the several public departments. Now, sir, what does the word "state" mean? It has various significations. It means, according to the most approved lexicographers, when connected with other words, which indicate the sense in which it is used, a body politic. In the way in which it is used in this instance, it evidently means the affairs of the body politic; not some of the affairs, but any or all the affairs of State.

The committee (said Mr. L) have a commission given to them by this House, acting under the authority of the Constitution, in virtue of which, they can go into any Department of this Government, and examine every thing there in which the people are interested. The Committee on Public Expenditures have general powers; the other six committees relating to the departments have, each, special powers.

But granting, (said Mr. L.) that the aggregate powers of the six committees, are equal to those of the Committee on Public Expenditures; yet the jurisdiction is concurrent. Concurrence of jurisdiction among several committees can form no reason for abolishing any one of them. That on Public Expenditures, I contend, has no right to look into and decide upon the jurisdiction of other and similar committees. For instance, it cannot decide upon the powers of the Committee of Ways and Means. In this respect, these committees differ from courts of law. In some matters, several courts may have, or be supposed to have, jurisdiction; and if a suitor enter his plea to the jurisdiction, it is incumbent on the court to adjudicate on the plea. This would be all right. But no court would institute an inquiry to see if some other judicial tribunal had not the same powers it had; and if such a one was found, then decline taking cognizance of such suit or plea as might be preferred before it. But, as I said before, (remarked Mr. L.) if a plea to the jurisdiction is made, the court must decide; and if it finds that it has no jurisdiction, (not if it concludes it has concurrent jurisdiction,) then it will refuse to entertain the suit. It strikes me (said Mr. L.) that all that a committee of this House has to do, is to exercise the powers conferred upon it by the rule creating it.

Again, sir: all the rules, and this among the rest, have been adopted at each successive Congress. This present session, the 71st rule, the one now in question, was re-enacted. Certainly, therefore, it cannot be successfully argued that this rule is repealed. To sustain such a position, would seem almost to deny our own senses. We have all, or at least most, of us, have witnessed the enactment of this very same rule, which, according to the effect of the resolution, if adopted, must be considered as repealed. The rule for construing statutes, namely, that a subsequent law repeals a prior one, so far as it is incompatible therewith, does not apply in this case, because all the rules involved in this debate were solemnly enacted by the House at the same time, and consequently all must have equal force and equal validity. Now, sir, said Mr. L. there is another aspect in which this resolution is objectionable; he meant it was clearly inexpedient. In what I have to say upon the point of expediency, I will, said he, "keep the state of the question in my eye." I do not want to mingle political topics in the debate upon this resolution, nor shall I wilfully subject myself to be called to order. He contended there were many and powerful considerations, some of which were applicable to the House itself, and others more especially applicable to the Opposition party, why this resolution ought not to pass. Have we not, said Mr. L. year after year, heard long and loud complaints about the alleged wasteful and prodigal expenditure of the public moneys? Have not abuses, in every Department of the Government, been charged and trumpeted through the party presses from one end of the nation to the other? These complaints were heard during the Administration of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] We have heard them in still louder tones during the administration of General Jackson, and we hear them even now made against the administration of the present distinguished and able Chief Magistrate, Mr. Van Buren. All appropriations, of whatever kind, must, according to the Constitution, receive the sanction of this House; not one dollar can be applied to any purpose, by any officer of Government, except in pursuance of law, in the passage of which this House must of necessity have a voice. Vast sums are annually received and disbursed by the different departments. Millions flow into and out of your Treasury every year. The people look to the Legislative branch of the Government to extend their aid, at all events, in preventing abuses, and in correcting such as may creep into the management of the public treasure, in any of the various ramifications of the business of the Government. What, sir, shall we be told that there is nothing for the Committee on Public Expenditures to do? The ready response is, there is the Treasury Department, through the various branches and agencies of which pass millions of dollars every year; there is your Navy Department, and all the expenditures connected with it; there is your Post Office Department; and there is your Department of War, and its large expenditures, and in close connection with this may be ranked our Indian affairs—the expenses of removing Indians, and of buying out their rights to lands, &c. Will not all these vast and magnificent fields furnish sufficient ground for a committee, however experienced, however learned and laborious, to explore? Surely they will; and, indeed, in my humble opinion, said Mr. L. instead of lessening, we should rather augment, the number of committees, and more equally distribute labor among the members of this House. In this view of the subject, I would most respectfully and anxiously inquire, in the language of the resolution, why will you abolish one of the most important committees, which has been raised for the purpose of having and exercising a supervisory power over all the affairs of State, so far as expenditures are concerned? Why deprive ourselves, by a kind of suicidal act, of the main instrument which the Constitution of our country has placed in our hands for accomplishing these great purposes?

I do not, said Mr. L. wish to be understood as admitting that any abuses now really exist, which demand the attention of the committee. I know of none; and from my confidence in the President and heads of the Departments, cannot suppose any are allowed to exist. The non-existence of abuses, however, forms no argument in favor of doing away with the committee. Destroy your committee, and you will at the same time lose every particle of moral influence which the having a standing tribunal, which can look into the various branches of Government, whenever it chooses, is calculated to give the House. Sir, I would, said Mr. L keep the committee; I would preserve this board of visiters, in order that every Administration, in time to come, may at all times keep its "house in order," not knowing "the day nor the hour when they may be called upon to give an account of their stewardship."

I confess, sir, when I saw the Committee on Public Expenditures composed of a majority of honorable gentlemen opposed to the President, I expected that every department where any abuses might be suspected to exist, would be probed to the core. I had a right to suppose this would be the case; and, in all candor, I declare that, in my opinion, none could doubt as to the talents, experience, and peculiar capacity of the honorable gentlemen composing the committee, to pursue any inquiry they might deem it proper to undertake. But, sir, the committee have not made any investigation. Shall I say that "a change has come o'er the spirit of their dreams?" or, rather, may I not say that they have no grounds on which to found a reasonable belief that these crying abuses, about which we hear so much, (I don't mean in this House, but elsewhere, all over the country,) do exist? A great political contest is now going on; and those who war against the present worthy incumbent of the Presidential chair, will have to address the understandings of the people, if they expect to make any thing out of alleged abuses in the public expenditures. The people are intelligent, and before they set their faces against the present Administration, they must be convinced. If there be any abuses, how could they be better pointed out, how or by whom more satisfactorily shown to the American people, than by a committee of this House?

Mr. Speaker, some short time ago my distinguished colleague, [Mr. BIDDLE,] in one of his eloquent speeches, alluded to that portion of the President's last message, wherein he says, "I have directed the estimates for 1840 to be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and to be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service. They will be found less than the expenditures of 1839 by over five millions of dollars." My distinguished colleague alluded to this part of the message in his comments upon the subject of the proposed appropriation to the Cumberland road, and argued with great ability that Congress ought not to make any appropriations which were not embraced in the estimates of the Departments; that the President held out the idea of economy and retrenchment in public expenditures, and friends of the Administration in the House advocated appropriations in addition to those included in the estimates. This course he considered wrong, and pronounced it deceptive. Now, sir, the House are not bound by the estimates of the heads of Departments. It has a constitutional right to originate all bills of appropriation, and may, at its pleasure, confine itself to the estimates, or go beyond them. Might I not, as a friend of the Administration, with equal propriety, say in reference to the Opposition, that this thing of keeping up the cry of abuses in the expenditures of the public treasure, and not investigating them, when they now have, and during the last Congress had, the power of doing it to their entire satisfaction, is "keeping the promise to the ear, and breaking it to the hope?" Is not this course well calculated to lead a confiding people into error In saying this, I beg leave to remark, that nothing disrespectful to the honorable gentlemen on the committee is intended. I do not complain that they shrink from any necessary labor or duty.

But, sir, in conclusion, allow me to say, that I could not vote for abolishing this Committee on Public Expenditures. How would I justify or explain such a course to an honest and enlightened constituency. I take pleasure in saying, sir, here, in my place, that I have reason to feel proud of such a constituency as I have the honor to represent. Would they be satisfied with my telling them there was no necessity for this Committee on Public Expenditures? Would they agree that the only committee, which had a jurisdiction commensurate with all the departments of Government; which could march into any of the places where the public treasure was kept, and detect abuses, if any prevailed; would they, I say, agree to have that committee abolished? I think not. But, Mr. Speaker, I have already pursued this subject further than was my purpose, when I commenced, and will detain the House no longer. I have done.

Mr. MORRIS of Pennsylvania obtained the floor, and said he believed the subject had been sufficiently debated, and moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the gentleman would withdraw the motion, as he was desirous of saying a few words on the subject.

Mr. MORRIS would consent, provided the gentleman from Massachusetts would promise to renew the motion.

Mr. ADAMS thought it probable that, after he should have made his remarks, some gentleman would wish to reply; he could not, therefore, make the promise required.

Mr. MORRIS said that, as that was the case, he could not withdraw his motion.

The question was then taken on ordering the previous question, and, there being no second,

Mr. ADAMS spoke in reference to the importance of continuing the committee in existence. It was his opinion that, if the Committee on Public Expenditures had taken up the document which he held in his hand, (relating to receipts and expenditures,) they might have saved millions of dollars. They might do so even now, late as it was in the session; and if they did their duty, the country would have reason to rejoice if the House should refuse to abolish the committee. Mr. A. concluded his remarks by incidentally alluding to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill before the House.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day; but pending that motion,

The SPEAKER laid before the House further testimony in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which,

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Several Senate bills were taken from the SPEAKER's table, and appropriately committed.

Senate bill granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, was taken up for commitment; when,

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, with the following instructions; which were read as follows:

"That said bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to report an amendment graduating the price of the public lands that have been offered for sale at public auction; and further, to report an amendment, dividing the nett proceeds of the sale of the public lands with the twenty-six States of this Union, according to the Federal pro rata of representation, to be ascertained by the census of 1840, to take effect after the first of January, 1841."

After a few remarks from Mr. WHITE in support of his proposition;

The CHAIR suggested that the proposition to commit was not at that time strictly in order as he was only permitted to take up the bill for reference by universal consent; and he suggested that the bill be laid aside for the present. The motion to commit was laid over.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CASEY in the chair) and took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, who was still entitled to the floor, continued his remarks in relation to the causes of the increase in the expenditures. The present Administration came into power to lessen the expenses of Government, to have retrenchment, and it was no excuse or apology for them why they have not made this retrenchment, to say that the Opposition voted for the increase in the expenditures The Opposition were not pledged to retrenchment and reform. The Administration came into power under a promise that it would be done. They have had the power in one branch or the other of Congress, and should have prevented the increase in expenditures, even if the Whig party did vote the increase. He believed no retrenchment would commence or take place, except it came from the Executive—and that none could be carried through without his concurrence, inasmuch as none could be carried through with his opposition. He has the means and power to carry out reform. He then adverted to the public printing, which he said could be reduced. He was in favor of dispensing with the branch mints, on the ground that the mint at Philadelphia was adequate to all the wants of the Government. He spoke generally in favor of retrenchment.

Mr. REED obtained the floor, and justified the latitude of debate on this bill, on the ground that a proposition heretofore made by him to commit the President's message to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of debate had failed. There must be some fit occasion to discuss the policy of the Administration—to examine its abuses if they exist or seemed to exist. Mr. R. after adverting to the increase of the expenditures, referred to some items which he was in favor of reducing. He was aware that they were called for to fulfil the provisions of existing laws; and if gentlemen were opposed to such laws, he knew of no other occasion that could be embraced to express his opposition to them.

He had endeavored, in vain, for many years, to correct abuses; and particularly the salaries of marshals and attorneys of the United States, for which an item of $14,500 is inserted in this bill. He was understood to call upon the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to explain in what amount to individuals this aggregate was distributed.

Mr. JONES of Virginia replied that the salaries of these officers were fixed by various laws of Congress, long since passed, and that they varied, ranging from $200 to $600 each.

Mr. REED was understood to say that he had called upon the Department a year ago for information in relation to the salaries and fees of the marshals and attorneys, and that the report had been since made, by which it was seen that they receive an enormous amount.

Mr. JONES replied that not one dollar of it was drawn from the public Treasury. The sum was made up from fees and costs.

Mr. REED said that made it much worse. It was drawn from the people, who were least able to pay it. The Government being more wealthy, it would not operate so hard if it were drawn from that source.

Mr. JONES of Virginia hoped the gentleman would not attribute the amount of these fees as an act for which the Administration was responsible.

Mr. REED complained of the large amount paid to these officers, and said it was an abuse which it was the duty of the Administration to correct.

Mr. JONES said if the gentleman would introduce a bill to correct this which he conceives an abuse, or any other abuse, he would vote for it. The fees of these officers fluctuate, and are, at times, very small in amount.

Mr. REED, after commenting on this topic for some time, adverted to the light-house system, and complained of a transfer made by the President of the sum of five thousand dollars, appropriated to that object, to the construction of the public buildings at Washington, when he was interrupted by

Mr. JONES of Virginia, who wished to say a few word in explanation of that matter. It had been frequently stated in the House as a matter of great astonishment, that the President should have transferred an appropriation intended for light-houses to the Treasury building. He would inform the gentleman that the President had done nothing but what he had been fully authorized by law to do. During the last few years appropriations had been made by Congress for the erection of light-houses, but with this proviso, "that after an examination of the location, their erection should be deemed necessary." Now the examination in relation to the light-houses in question, had been made by commissioners, under the superintendence of the Navy Department, and the commissioners had reported that they were not suitable locations. This money, to the amount of thirty or forty thousand dollars, being unapplied, the President, under the authority given to him by law, transferred the amount to the Treasury building. This was at a time, too, when the whole amount of appropriation for the building was exhausted, and when there was no roof on it. With a view, therefore, to protect the building from injury, the President had exercised the power given to him, and made the transfer. The gentleman must, upon reflection, be aware that the President had done no more than his duty, in thus applying the money for the purpose of protecting the building from the weather. That was absolutely necessary; and having accomplished that, he had gone no farther. The gentleman ought also to know, that if the money had not been applied to this object, it would, within two years, have become a part of the surplus fund, and could not be again taken from the Treasury, without another appropriation. Mr. J. then referred to the laws giving to the President the discretionary power which he had exercised.

Mr. REED continued his remarks, in the course of which he adverted to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEIM] in relation to his views of the ballot system; when he was interrupted by Mr. KEIM, who desired to be understood on this subject. He was desirous that the ballot for the people should prevail; but that, with reference to their Representatives, he advocated the viva voce system. He deemed it important that the people should know how their agents and Representatives voted on all occasions.

Mr. R. then resumed, and continued his remarks for a short time on that branch of the subject, and then adverted to the removal of the deposites from the Bank of the United States. He condemned such removal, and also the deposite of the revenues of the Government with the State institutions. He commented on the character of some of those institutions in his State, and censured them as unfit depositories. He referred to many other topics which had been touched upon since the bill was under consideration, and particularly the purposes and designs of the Hartford Convention. He was understood to say that the gentlemen who composed that convention were great and good men.

Mr. HOPKINS here obtained the floor, but, by request, yielded it to

Mr. DUNCAN, who was understood to say that an inference might be drawn from some of the remarks made on yesterday, that the friends of the Administration had been challenged to contradict the correctness of the statement which had been sent into Virginia, in relation to the expenditures of the Government, signed by the Federal Vigilance Committee, and that they dared not take the responsibility to do so. Now, to prevent such an inference, Mr. D. said he dared take the responsibility to say that that statement was not correct; and he would take occasion at another time to go into an investigation in detail, to prove it was deceptive in character. It was for base party purposes—it was merely the corner of the book—it was garbled from the documents in which an explanation in detail was made of those expenditures, and which explanation should have gone with it, to make it intelligible. The reason that he had not contradicted it yesterday, was because he could not obtain the floor to do so.

Mr. HOPKINS, after some preliminary remarks, alluded to the charges of extravagant expenditure made against the present and late Administrations, in the document sent recently into Virginia, with a view of influencing the election of that State. He said he should be able to show that, instead of the President being responsible for the extravagance charged in the document, the blame rested on the Opposition themselves, and he would, by a reference to the journal, prove that most of the large appropriations which swelled the aggregate of expenditures, had been voted for by a majority of the Opposition. He appealed to gentlemen whether, under this state of things, it was fair and just to hold the President responsible, when the expenditures had been supported by a majority of his political adversaries on that floor. In the remarks he was about to make, he did not wish for the committee to rely on his statements alone; but he intended to prove them by a reference to the journal, and then, so far as the yeas and nays would show, the people could judge for themselves as to who was responsible for the extraordinary expenditures.

Mr. H. said he would refer to a single instance where an appropriation to a great amount had been made, by an almost unanimous vote of both parties, but which was set down in the document as a part of the extravagant expenditures of the Administration. He referred to the appropriation of ten millions made last year, to provide for contingencies which might arise from the excitement then existing in relation to the Northern frontier. Now that appropriation was made by an almost unanimous vote of both parties, there being only 6 votes in the negative; and yet, strange as it might appear, this large item was set down in the document, and formed a part of the charges made against the President. Was this fair? Was this justice? Was it right to hold the President responsible for an appropriation carried by an almost unanimous vote of the House? For his part, he must and would denounce it as unjust, as calculated to deceive the people of the country, and to raise unjust prejudices against an individual, against whom not the slightest blame was to be attached.

Having mentioned that instance, he would also refer to another, where similar injustice had been attempted. It was in relation to the indemnities received from foreign nations. These indemnities, it was well known, were received by the Government, acting in the capacity of a trustee only, and the moneys were paid out again to the individual citizens to whom they belonged; and yet these were also charged against the Administration, and formed a part of the aggregate.

Mr. H. proceeded to show that the millions recovered from France, Spain, Denmark, Naples, and other nations, and merely passing through the Government to merchants and others, for whom they were recovered, were all set down in the document as an expenditure out of the Treasury of the money of this country, when in fact this was money paid by foreign countries out of their treasury to American citizens. He appealed to the candor of gentlemen whether such a course was fair, to charge the Administration with the expenditures, when the Government was acting merely as the trustee of others.

Mr. H. then alluded to the several items set down in the document for harbors, the pension fund, the Cumberland road, Indian expenditures, &c. all of which he proved had been supported by the Opposition themselves.

He also referred to the item for defraying the contingent expenses of the House, which, of late had increased to such a great amount, and which, likewise, was charged in the document against the President. He asked whether it was not monstrous to attempt to blame that officer for such an item. How was it possible that gentleman could attempt to hold the President of the United States responsible for an increase of the contingent expenses of their own body? Had the President any thing in the world to do with it? And yet this happened to be one of the appropriations charged in that document against him. He would ask if there was a single gentleman on that floor who would get up and attempt to argue that any one but themselves was responsible for such an appropriation? Certainly not. Then how great was the injustice of attempting to throw the responsibility on the President. For his part, he had no hesitation in admitting that the contingent expenses of the House were, in some respects, too great, and he would most willingly co-operate with others for the reduction; but still that did not alter the case in relation to the responsibility of the House itself.

He might go on and mention many other items of a similar character, and before he concluded, he should have occasion to refer to official documents, for the purpose of proving the facts.

Mr. H. after adverting at much length to the various items of expenditure of past years, and showing that the items complained of had been supported by the Opposition themselves, expressed his astonishment at the course of the latter. He said if they would take the trouble to examine the various items of those extraordinary appropriations, and deduct them from the aggregate, they would find that the amount of difference was very small indeed.

Mr. H. then went on to say, that with a view of all these facts, and considering how the Opposition themselves had acted in supporting those appropriations, he could not say less than that, by the publication of the document in question, crying and barefaced injustice had been done to the President by those who attempt to hold him responsible for the whole expenditures.

The remarks of Mr. H. will be give in full hereafter.

Mr. ANDREWS obtained the floor, but, at his solicitation, yielded it, for the purpose of personal explanation, to

Mr. CORWIN, who replied at great length to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HOPKINS,] and particularly such parts as related to the document, purporting to give a statement of the expenditures of the Government, which had been sent out by the Whig Central Intelligence Committee, of which Mr. C. was a member. That document, it seemed, had given rise to great speculation. Mr. C. said, in consequence of the terms in which that gentleman had characterized it, and as his name was signed to it, some explanation was required from him. That gentleman, in characterizing it, had used one or two adjectives too much. He understood the gentleman to say that crying injustice had been done to the President by sending out that leaf of printed matter to which he had adverted. Mr. C. did not know whether he signed that document as an executor or a witness; but, since the gentleman had connected his name with it, and had attached to the document so suspicious a character, and thought it had done such crying injustice, it became him to make some sort of apology. Mr. C. after some preliminary remarks, said the statement was made up of the words and figures taken from the public records: that it was made in reply to a resolution of the House, by the Secretary of the Treasury. It was a statement of facts and figures sent in by that Secretary. It was called for for the purpose of disseminating the information it contained among the people. But the chief complaint seemed to be, that no explanation of the causes of the increase had accompanied the statement. He knew that it was very easy to show that the appropriations to light-houses had caused a part of this increase, and that a large portion had been sunk in the swamps of Florida. The whole crime seemed to be, that they did not go into an investigation to show these facts to the people. He argued that if the Whigs did vote for the appropriation making the aggregate in the years of the past and present Administrations, included in this document, it would not add any thing to the stock of knowledge of the people to tell them so. All that he had to say was, that if the Whigs did vote for them, turn them out. Mr. C. was understood not to coincide with the views of the friends of the Administration, that the President was not responsible for the increase in the expenditures on the ground that he could not exercise any influence over the deliberations of Congress; and went into an argument to show that such influence might be exercised. The friends of the Administration could not, he said, rid themselves of the responsibility of the increase of the expenditures on the ground that the Whig party had voted for them. He did not believe that the Whig party had voted more uniformly for the large appropriations which swelled the expenses of Government than the friends of the Administration.

Mr. DUNCAN inquired of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] whether the document sent out to influence the Virginia election, contained the whole document reported from the Department?

Mr. CORWIN replied, that if the gentleman alluded to the report of the Treasury Department, that was entire; but if he alluded the other part of the printed pages, it was not all there, but mere extracts. God forbid that it should be all there. Mr. C. said it was not fair for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOPKINS] to charge them with doing injustice because they did not make an elaborate explanation of the items which made the aggregate of the expenditures in that statement. Mr. C. then spoke at great length in reply to attacks on the principles of General Harrison; and particularly the exceptions which had been taken to his refusal to reply to the interrogatories which had been put to him to draw out his opinions. He did not consider it of so much importance that his opinions should be known on one or two isolated questions of the thousand subjects which occupied the public mind. Mr. C. spoke at some length on various other topics, and after concluding,

Mr. McKAY obtained the floor; when on his motion the committee rose. Then

The House, at 8 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, April 23, 1840.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the petition of the Florida, Georgia, and Alabama Railroad Company, praying a further extension of time on certain duty bonds; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a petition from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. PORTER presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Detroit, praying the adoption of measures for the preservation of the records of the Board of Commissioners for the adjustment of land titles in Detroit; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Miguel Eslava, made a favorable report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of sundry inhabitants of St. Clair, in the State of Michigan, praying that a duty of five cents may be imposed upon every pound of fish imported from the Canadas into the United States, said that he had been instructed by the committee to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial, and to move its reference to the Committee on Finance. The subject was one of importance; but he supposed that it could not be maturely or successfully acted upon until the tariff generally should be taken up. That will and must be done at the next session. He presumed that no partial movement in relation to it could succeed, and that this memorial must take its chance with the tariff. The motion was agreed to, and the memorial, properly belonging to that committee, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of J. L. Schoolcraft, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of James Ware, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill for altering the time of holding the term of the courts in the Western District of Pennsylvania, at Williamsport, reported the same without amendment.

On motion of Mr. W. the bill was then taken up, considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Avery, Saltmarsh, and Company, was taken up, and after a discussion, in which Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, CLAY of Ala. LUMPKIN, TAPPAN, KING, WHITE, and HUBBARD, participated,

Mr. TAPPAN moved to lay it on the table; which was disagreed to—ayes 16, nays 18.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, it was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The bill to amend the act entiled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for laying off the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines, and the towns of Belleview, Dubuque, and Peru, in the county of Dubuque, Territory of Wiskonsin, and for other purposes,'" was taken up, on motion of Mr. YOUNG, and after being discussed, was uniformly passed over for the present.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands was taken up, when a highly animated and interesting discussion took place, wherein Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, CLAY of Kentucky, WALKER, MERRICK, BENTON, HUBBARD, WHITE, CRITTENDEN, PRESTON, SMITH of Indiana, CALHOUN, and others, participated.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out the third and fourth sections of the bill; the question having been taken, was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dixon, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Merrick, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sturgeon, Williams, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tappan, and Walker—16

Mr. PRESTON moved to strike out the second section, but, at the suggestion of Mr. CLAY, limited his motion to strike out that part only in the section which conferred the privilege of purchasing at a less price to settlers on adjacent lands.

After some further debate on this motion, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, and Williams—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—26.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, and Ruggles—11.

And then the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, April 23, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the business first in order during the morning hour was the following resolution, reported, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS] from the Committee on Public Expenditures, viz:

Resolved, That the duties originally assigned to the Committee on Public Expenditures, by the rules of the House, having since been transferred to other committees, and the said Committee on Public Expenditures having no duties to perform, that the rule for its appointment be abolished.

Mr. ADAMS, who was entitled to the floor, argued generally to show why the Committee on Public Expenditures should be continued in existence. He said that there were, perhaps, not many members in the House who knew better than he did, that a strict examination of the accounts of the several Departments was not a very agreeable thing. Mr. A. then adverted to the course of argument indulged in by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. OGLE] to which he was understood to take exception, and to censure. He said that when his colleague, [Mr. LINCOLN,] who, during his necessary absence, permitted him [Mr. A.] to occupy the seat from which he was now speaking, spoke in his place, and gave an account here of the manner in which he went to the President's house, and examined into every chair, and table, and bed, and bedding, and washstand, and all the other furniture of a bed chamber, the good feelings of his colleague's nature could not restrain him from saying that it was a painful duty, and that he hoped he should never be called to perform it again.

Mr. A. had undergone the process of examination more than once, and knew what it was; and hoped every member, without regard to party policy, would put the question to himself, whether it would accord with his feelings to have his domestic sanctuary violated by the scrutinizing visit of a stranger—his household, his castle—which is so acknowledged to be by the common law. The consequence (said Mr A.) of the late examination of the President's house has been exposed to this House and to the nation; and, so far as relates to that subject, he believed the examination made by his colleague, and to which he had referred, was made as chairman of the Committee on the Public Buildings.

Mr. A. would recommend to the SPEAKER of the House, (who had appointed the committees at this time, and all who might hereafter become Speakers of the House,) to appoint persons to perform services of that nature, men of delicate feelings, and who would discharge their duty in a manner similar to that of his colleague. Mr. A. would say to the committees who might undertake to examine into the several Departments of the Government: when you go to the head of any Department to examine expenditures, go there with the feelings of men, and not as party politicians; go there, considering what would be your feelings were you placed in that situation. If you apprehend the affairs of any department are not properly conducted, go to the head of it, and ascertain facts. If the committees on the expenditures of the several departments should do their duty, they would be auxiliary to the general Committee on the Public Expenditures, and would enable them to make more satisfactory reports than have ever been made. Mr. A would specify an occurrence during one session, about the year 1820 When he was at the head of the Department of State, the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of State came to that Department, and he pointed out every article of expenditure to them, and laid the list before them, and they inquired into the cause of them. They also require of him a written statement of the expenditures of the Department. Mr. Wood, the chairman, reported to this House, and appended his (Mr. A's) statement to the report, which was entirely satisfactory to all parts of the House. If such a thing was done at one session, why not (said Mr. A.) do it at every session? Why not? Why should it not be done? He believed it would save a great deal of expense; and stated this as his reason for the vote which he would give against the resolution to abolish the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi said it was of the utmost moment that the various reports and bills which had been accumulating on the hands of the several committees should be reported and acted on. The House had been detained for nearly a week with the question under discussion. For himself, he was ready to vote upon it, and he believed the whole House was prepared to vote upon it; and, therefore, he called for the previous question.

Mr. CUSHING said that this question had been a subject of controversy, and solemnly settled at previous Congresses, and therefore called for the yeas and nays; which were accordingly ordered, and resulted—yeas 6, nays 148

So the resolution was rejected.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. McKAY, who was entitled to the floor, made an able vindication of the Administration from the charge of extravagance, which had been alleged by the Opposition in the House. He adverted to that part of the message of the President of the United States, which expressed a desire for an economical administration of the Government, and which said that if Congress did not exceed the estimates, that there would be a reduction of several millions of dollars this year in the expenditures. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, said Mr. McK. had told the House that that committee had reduced the amount on some of the items in the estimates; he thought that the probability was, that at the end of the present session of Congress, the appropriations would not exceed the estimates—that a retrenchment of some twelve millions would be effected at the end of the three years of the present Administration. This he thought at least a guarantee that the promise of retrenchment was not a hollow profession; but that it would be actually effected to that large extent. Notwithstanding the expenditures were something more at the present time than at the last year of the administration of Mr. Adams, it was no proof of extravagance. Extravagance did not consist in the amount expended, but in the manner of the expenditure—whether it was legitimate and advantageous to the great national interests which are peculiarly committed to the fostering care of the General Government. The expenditures in old and established Governments ought not to increase with its growth in population and wealth; but the case of the Federal Government was a peculiar one. A large portion of the country was comparatively new, and every thing had to be created; and therefore the expenditures must, to a certain extent, keep pace with the development of the resources of the nation, and the consequent wants of the Government, growing out of the rapid increase of the population of the country, and its extension over an immense territory. By the addition of new States to the Federal Union, new wants necessarily arise, and some augmentation of the expenditures consequently grow out of it. Mr. McK. then exhibited statistics, shewing that the increase in the expenditures, in proportion to the development of the resources of the nation, new wants by the addition of States and increase of population, had been less since General Jackson came into power, than prior to the end of Mr. Adams's administration. He also adverted to statistics showing the progressive increase in the expenses of the State Governments, particularly the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, and that such increase had been rapid and regular from year to year, more so than that of the National Government, without even taking into the account the enormous debts incurred by the States for conducting their works of internal improvement. The mere fact of the increase of the amount of expenditures, if laid out constitutionally and beneficially, was not proof of extravagance. To carry out the views above taken in relation to the progressive increase which was inevitable and unavoidable, from the extension of the Union, Mr. McK. adverted to the Post Office Department, and the great amount necessary to carry on its operations. This Department derived nothing from the Government for its support; yet, since the administration of Mr. Adams, the $5,000,000 in round numbers necessary to carry on its operations, have to pass through the Treasury, and be appropriated in the bill before the House, and thus to that amount apparently contributed to swell the expenditures of the Government, without in fact constituting any part of it. If the Whig argument was correct, that increase in the expenditures was proof of extravagance, why there was great extravagance in this Department. The rates of postage remained the same as they were at the time of Mr. Adams, and yet its revenues have swelled to near $5,000,000. But during the administration of that gentleman, the revenue of the Department was only $1,600,000. He asked if there was a gentleman belonging to the Opposition in the House, who had the boldness to rise in his place and assert that the disbursement of this large sum of money was proof of extravagance. Look at the great increase given to the mail facilities throughout the country—the great increase in the post offices from about seven thousand to near fourteen thousand. And all this, too, effected without a single dollar of increase of taxes on the people. This shows the great development of the resources of the nation, and the wants consequent, and increased appropriations necessary to supply such wants. The gentlemen in the Opposition, in their desire to throw the responsibility of the increase of expenditures upon the Executive Department of the Government, lose sight of the fact, that the President cannot originate money bills, or add any thing to the burdens of the appropriations, or take them off. Congress alone has that power, and is, therefore, responsible to the people for the amount of money taken from their pockets. The President has no control over the expenditures. He cannot expend a dollar, except it be appropriated by law of Congress. His only power is to see it judiciously applied, in fulfilment of these laws.

Mr. McK. then referred to the messages of General Jackson against heavy expenditures, and commented thereon; and proved that, if it had not been for the interposition of his veto power, the system of extravagance on objects of internal improvement which had grown up under the Administration of Mr. Adams, would have been swelled to upwards of one hundred millions more than had been appropriated to that object since General Jackson went into the Presidential chair. To prove that the promises of retrenchment were not hollow, during his administration, Mr. McK. showed, from official statements, that not a new tax on duty had been laid during the whole period, or since, but that a great many duties had been reduced, amounting, in the periods below, as follows, viz:

In 1831,	- - - -	$3,723,000
1832,	- - - -	7,304,000
1833,	- - - -	19,789,000
1834,	- - - -	24,445,000
1835,	- - - -	27,453,000
1836,	- - - -	34,688,000

making an actual reduction in the burdens on the people of these amounts.

In the last four years, the reduction of taxes on imports was larger than the whole amount of actual receipts into the Treasury during the administration of Mr. Adams. Yet these Whig gentlemen are contending that there has been no retrenchment of the burdens on the people. If the tariff act of 1828 had remained unaltered, the receipts into the Treasury would have been upwards of one hundred millions more than they were during the administration of General Jackson, notwithstanding the large amounts of receipts during that period; yet, by this enormous reduction, the burdens of the people have been lessened more than one half. Mr. McK. then showed on what particular articles the reduction had been made, being principally necessaries of life, including tea, coffee, and brown sugars, on which some forty millions had been reduced. On the articles of tea alone, 15 millions reduction had been effected in the space of three years; and on coffee some $13,000,000. Mr. McK. then argued that the great accumulation of surplus revenues was one great cause of the increase in the expenditures. He said if the money was collected it must be spent. It would be ruinous to the best interests of the country to have hoarded revenues thus unnecessarily collected. If the money was taken from the people, it must be sent back to the people—it must be expended. Therefore, the most effectual way to diminish the expenses of Government would be not to take more money from the people than was absolutely necessary for great public purposes. It was the duty of Congress to see that no more was collected than was necessary; and when collected that it should be appropriated to constitutional objects. If more had been heretofore collected than the proper wants of the Government required, those who opposed the repeal of the duties were responsible. He then quoted from the speeches of Mr. CLAY, to show that if the views of the Executive had been carried out in regard to the tariff, the revenues from imports would have been still further reduced. Mr. CLAY admitted, in 1833, that his American system was in danger from the friends of the Administration—that it would have been overthrown if it had not been for the compromise act. Mr. C. also admitted in 1836, that he foresaw, at the time of the compromise act, that it would produce a surplus in the Treasury, and endeavored to guard against it by his bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. The Opposition were then, and now are, friendly to a high tariff.

So far, then, as the fact that too much money had been collected, contributed to swell the expenditures of Government, the Opposition, that now declaimed so much about extravagance, were responsible.

Mr. McK. then showed the large amount of goods imported free of duty since the administration of Mr. Adams; which, during the administration of Jackson alone, exceeded that amount by many millions. He showed the good effects of the specie circular in preventing large amounts of depreciated bank paper from coming into the Treasury, and thus did away with one cause which would make it necessary to swell the appropriation to get rid of the money; and prevented the rich lands of the West from passing into the hands of speculators.

Mr. McK. then adverted to the assertion of some gentlemen who wished to hold the Executive responsible for the appropriations, that they would not vote for any measure unless estimates were received from the Departments for that purpose. He said that the appropriations had generally exceeded the estimates of the Departments from the foundation of the Government. The estimates depended more or less upon the legislation of Congress; and cited many instances to prove the ground assumed. The bill to increase the pay of the navy, which was voted for by the Opposition generally, one year alone caused an increase in the estimates for the next year. It was thus that the estimates were increased by the action of Congress. The act of Congress, which one year caused an excess of appropriations over the estimates, next year, by the same process, swelled the estimates over those of the previous years.

It was degrading to the character of the House to say that Congress should be confined to the estimates. It was the duty of the Executive to report the amounts of estimates necessary to fulfil the provisions of existing laws, and not for him to say that such estimates should not be exceeded. The President had not said so; but if the argument of gentlemen prevail, it would, in effect, be giving the power to the Executive to originate all the appropriation bills. He would be glad to see, in many instances, the appropriations reduced below the estimates; but they were in accordance with the existing laws, and could not be touched, without a repeal of those laws.

Mr. McK. then showed that even the estimates, under existing laws, fluctuated. Supplies to the army and navy being influenced by the state of the currency of the country, cost more some years than others; this was one cause that contributed to swell the appropriation during the last and present Administrations, the prices of provision during that period being very high. He then went into an examination in detail, and showed the large amounts appropriated to national objects during that time, exceeded by many millions appropriations to such objects during the administration of Mr. Adams. He examined in detail all the appropriations which made up the excess over the administration of that gentleman, and showed conclusively that many of the objects of those appropriations originated with the Opposition, and that that party had invariably voted for all the appropriations, for the increase of which they wished to make the present Administration accountable. The remarks of Mr. McK. will be published in full hereafter.

Mr. EVANS took exception to the course of remark of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. [McKAY,] in relation to the causes of the increase of the expenditures; and particularly took exception to his argument in relation to the burdens of taxation of which the people had been relieved during the administration of General Jackson. He replied at length to the topics. He did not deny, however, that the Whig party had voted for the greater proportion of the appropriations to which that gentleman had adverted. Mr. E. said he did vote for the appropriation to fortifications, as the gentleman from North Carolina had charged upon him; and it was no mortification to him to have his votes, which were recorded on the journals, in favor of appropriations to all the great objects to which the gentleman had adverted, exhibited to the House and the country. He did not boast there or elsewhere that he did vote for them. If he had any pride about the matter, it was because he had voted for appropriations to harbors, fortifications, light-houses, and other great national objects. He did not profess to belong to a party in favor of a parsimonious Administration, though he was for an economical one. There could be economy in the expenditure of millions, and extravagance in the expenditure of hundreds. As for the expenditures on harbors, fortifications, roads, and light-houses, he took pride if his vote had helped them on. There was no economy in confining the expenditures of Government to a small amount—to fifteen millions, as had been proposed by one gentleman from North Carolina. Economy did not consist in confining to a small amount, but in judiciously applying what was appropriated to such objects were was worthy the care of the Government. He did not complain of the amount of the appropriations, but the manner in which it was applied. He disapproved the Indian policy—the policy of acquiring lands—which had caused the Indian wars, and which had thrown an immense expenditure of money upon the Government, and contributed to swell the appropriations, which he and the party to which he was attached were compelled to vote for, however much they were opposed to the policy making the appropriations necessary. Mr. E. agreed with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. McKAY] that too much had been said in the course of the debate on this bill, in throwing the responsibility of the appropriations on the President, that would tend to surrender all the powers of Congress to the dictation of the Executive. Some gentlemen had contended that they would not vote for any appropriation except the Executive Departments reported estimates for such purposes. He was totally opposed to the doctrine that Congress should vote nothing except upon the estimates of the Departments. All the Departments had a right to do, was to make estimates of the specific amounts necessary to carry out the provisions of law. Whenever the Executive stepped beyond that, he overstepped the duties assigned him by the Constitution and the laws. His duty is to follow the lead of legislation, and send us estimates of what is necessary to execute the provisions of laws passed by Congress. The great fault he found with the Executive now was, that, after he sent those estimates, under existing laws, he dared to tell us not to originate any new measures, for fear of exceeding those estimates. You, the representatives of the people, do not commence a single new work, however much the wants and interests of the country demand it. It was the business of Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional functions, without any dictation from the President, to originate and pass such measures as were necessary. It is their duty to see to the state of the Union, and to provide for its general welfare. The estimates of the Departments should not to be taken upon trust. If it had been otherwise, things would be different from what they now are.

Mr. ATHERTON went into a full examination of the principles of the party opposing the present Administration, identifying that party with the old Federal and Hartford Convention party; and made a most able vindication of the principles of the present Administration; [a full report of it will be published hereafter;] but, before concluding, yielded the floor to

Mr. HOWARD, who said that, with the permission of the gentleman from New Hampshire, he would move that the committee now rise.

A division being had on the motion, resulted, ayes 54, noes not counted: there being no quorum.

The committee then rose, and,

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of Jonathan H. Cobb of Dedham, and Samuel Cobb of Needham, Massachusetts, manufacturers of sewing silk and other silk goods, requesting Congress to impose a duty on the importation of foreign silk manufactures.

Mr. B. said that it had been demonstrated by experience, that our soil, our climate, and our pure and dry atmosphere, were peculiarly adapted to the production of silk. With this experience before our eyes, our country presented the strange, he was about to say absurd, spectacle of admitting the importation of foreign silks free of all duty. This was done at a time when our revenues were not equal to the expenses of the Government; and we were actually borrowing money to supply the deficiency. A new issue of Treasury notes might have been altogether avoided, had we, in time, imposed a moderate revenue duty on the importation of this article of luxury. Such a duty would have afforded, and would still afford, incidental encouragement to the production of silk—a branch of industry which was now struggling into existence, not only without the aid, but in direct opposition to the existing policy of our laws.

He confessed he could perceive no good reason why a revenue duty should not be imposed upon this article at the present session of Congress; whilst, as a mere revenue measure, there were many good reasons for our immediate action. We not only had lost the amount of revenue which would have resulted from a direct duty upon this article; but by a construction of the laws, which Congress never intended, we had lost very large sums incidentally.

There could be no policy more wise than that of varying our productions. This would essentially contribute to check the enormous amount of foreign importations under which our country now periodically suffered. The memorial states, "that in the year 1836, it required the whole exports of the Union, with the exception of cotton, and an addition of eight millions in cash, to pay for the importation of silk alone." Was not this statement—which he believed to be correct, although he had not himself recently examined the statistical tables—sufficient to carry conviction to every mind? All the products of agriculture, except cotton, of manufactures, and of the fisheries, which we exported, were exhausted in the purchase of foreign silks, and eight millions of dollars were required to supply the defficiency! What would the civilized world think of such folly? And as if this were the wisest policy in the world, we continue to throw open our ports to the free importation of this article, whilst we are borrowing money to defray the ordinary expenses of Government. Besides, this can never be regarded as a sectional question; because our whole country, North, South, East, and West, is admirably adapted to the production of this article.

The imposition of a revenue duty upon silk would be in exact accordance with the letter and spirit of the compromise law. It has expressly provided that, in the contingency of a deficiency of revenue before June, 1842, a duty not exceeding twenty per cent. might be imposed upon silk, or any other article not expressly excepted from duty by its terms. This contingency had happened. Our revenue was deficient, and why should Congress not immediately impose a duty of twenty per cent. on the importation of this artice? So well had he been convinced, both of the necessity and policy of such a measure, that he should have read a bill in his place, at the commencement of the present session, imposing this duty, could such a bill have originated in the Senate, under the Contitution of the United States.

Before he took his seat, he would make a remark on the compromise act of March, 1833, the true nature of which, he had reason to believe, was much misunderstood throughout the country. It was supposed by many that the enormous importations of 1839 were mainly produced by the reduction of duties under this law. This could not have been the case; and these importations must mainly be referred to other and much more powerful causes.

That act, which was approved on the 21 March, 1833, by President Jackson, provides that the excess of duty above twenty per cent. levied by virtue of former laws on the importation of foreign goods, shall be gradually reduced until it reaches that standard on the 30th June, 1842. One-tenth of this excess above twenty per cent. was to be deducted after the 31st December, 1833; two-tenths after the 31st December, 1835; three-tenths after the 31st December, 1837; four-tenths after the 31st December, 1839; seven-tenths after the 31st December, 1841; and after the 30th June, 1842, the duties were to sink to twenty per cent. The operation of this act can be best illustrated by presenting an example. Let us take the article of woollen goods. Under pre-existing laws, the duty upon woollens was generally fifty per ct. This duty was to be gradually reduced to twenty per cent. under the provisions of the compromise. The excess then to be deducted was thirty per cent. One-tenth of this excess, or three per cent. was taken off after the 31st December, 1833, which reduced the duty to forty-seven per cent.; another three per cent. was taken off after the 31st December, 1835, which reduced the duty to forty-four per cent.; a third three per cent. was taken off after the 31st December, 1837, which reduced the duty to forty-one per cent. Thus it will be perceived that the actual duty collected on foreign woollens during the period of the vast importations of 1839, was forty-one dollars for every hundred dollars of their valuation. And yet the woollen interest has been represented, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] not now in his place, as one of the most suffering and depressed interests of the country. We must seek the sources of this suffering and depression in causes different from the compromise law. The present duty upon woollen goods is thirty-eight dollars for each hundred dollars of their valuation; and will thus continue until the 31st December, 1841.

Mr. B. said he would make no comments upon these facts at present. His sole object now was to place the amount of the reduction of duties which had hitherto been made under the compromise act, clearly before his constituents and the country.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that he rose to make a few remarks, not in answer to the Senator, but in reference to the subject of his remarks. He had no doubt that silk was an article that ought to bear its due share of the duties; but he was utterly unwilling that it should be selected as a peculiar object of burden. It was, indeed, an article of luxury; but it was one in which the staple States had a deep interest. Silks and wine constitute the great articles of our exchanges with France for our cotton, rice, and tobacco. If they should be burdened with heavy duties, their importation would be proportionably diminished, and, with that diminution, there would be a corresponding falling off in the exports of our staple articles to France, accompanied by heavy loss to that portion of the country producing them. France was a country of great and growing consumption; and the intercourse with it ought to be favored, as far as the wants of the Treasury would permit. It was not his wish to secure any particular preference in favor of silk, nor was he willing to make it the subject of unequal burden. It would seem to be the views of some, that luxuries ought to be subject to high duties, because they were luxuries and necessaries—because they required protection against foreign competition; and thus between them, we are in danger of the return of the system of high duties, with all its disasterous consequences. Gentlemen ought to be compelled to take choice, or abandon their ground. For his part, if left to his choice, his favorite system would be, to lay the duties on luxuries, to the exclusion of necessaries; but he well knew that in this he would have to encounter a powerful interest, too powerful probably to be overcome; but he must insist that he should not be opposed from the same quarter, with this double and contradictory course of argument.

He hoped that this, and all other questions connected with the tariff, would be permitted to rest for the present. He was both willing and anxious to have the whole subject readjusted at this session, but it seemed to be determined that it should be postponed till the next. He had acquiesced; but was unwilling that gentlemen should take up favorite articles in advance, either to impose or repeal duties. It did not seem to him fair, and might embarrass the general adjustment at the coming session.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the petition of Langtree and Jenkins, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the Senate a statement of the names of banks in which special deposites in specie were made to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in anticipation of receiving therefor Treasury notes issued under the acts of 1837, 1838, and 1839; and a monthly statement of the amount of Treasury notes delivered on account of having received certificates of such special deposites, specifying the date and amount of the first of such Treasury notes so delivered, with the rates of interest of such Treasury notes, and the names of the persons or banks to whom the same were delivered. Also, a statement of the amount remaining in each of such banks to the said Treasurer at the date of the first of such certificates issued by such bank. And also, a monthly statement of the amount of all other deposites to the credit of said Treasurer, in such banks for each month, during the period between the date of such first certificate and the date of the payment of such Treasury notes. Also, a monthly statement of the aggregate amount of drafts drawn against such special or other deposites in each month during such period: stating the transactions with each bank in a separate account. And, also copies of all correspondence between the Department and such banks, and any person or persons, preceding and accompanying the making such special deposites, as first above named, and relating thereto, or the delivery of such Treasury notes.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to the Senate the aggregate amount of all expenditures or payments of every kind from the Treasury in each year, from 1824 to 1839 inclusive, in one column; and in another column, for each year, the aggregate amount, independent of the payments on account of the public debt, whether funded or unfunded; and in a third column the aggregate amount for permanent and ordinary purposes, excluding payments on account of objects either extraordinary or temporary—such as the public debt, trust funds and indemnities, claims of States for war debts, or 3 per cents. on lands sold, occasional donations in money to objects in the District of Columbia or otherwise, survey of the coast, taking the census, duties refunded, the exploring expedition, and materials collected for the gradual improvement of the navy, durable public buildings of all kinds, bridges and fortifications, all roads, canals, breakwaters and improvements in rivers and harbors, arming militia and forts, all pensions except those to invalids, and the purchases of title to lands from Indians, the removal of Indians and the wars, with such other payments as may have been made in those years for property lost or injuries committed during any hostilities.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the laws regulating the drawback of duty upon foreign merchandise imported into the United States, that such goods, transported from the Atlantic ports within and through the States, and re-exported from any port in the United States, situate upon the Upper St. Lawrence and the lakes, to any port or place in the British possessions, upon those waters, shall be entitled to the same privileges of drawback as similar merchandise re-exported from an Atlantic port to a foreign country.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 24, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee on the Public Buildings, [Mr. LINCOLN,] in relation to procuring a chandelier for the Halls of the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN said the chairman of the committee was absent, and, if there was any opposition, he would ask the House to postpone the consideration of the resolution until his return. He was not aware that any objection would be made to it. He considered it as a matter of economy to procure a chandelier, and also as important in regard to the health of members, the smoke and carbon generated by candles having a deleterious effect. Mr. P. would not wish the motion to postpone to be put, unless objection should be made to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said, as one who had long been in the House, he would not object, and should vote for the chandelier to be suspended in the Hall.

Mr PETRIKIN would state one thing for the information of the House. The chairman, if he were present, could prove that a chandelier would be much cheaper than candles. The committee were unanimous in their report as to the fact stated.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON would state one fact which came under his observation when he was on the Committee of Accounts. Whenever candles were lighted, and but partly burnt, they were not again used; and a loss was occasioned thereby almost equal to the expense of a chandelier.

The question was then taken; and the resolution was adopted.

The House then resolved into Committee of the Whole (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and took up the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. ATHERTON resumed his remarks of yesterday, in the course of which he alluded to the ground taken by the Opposition in relation to office holders. He said, from the remarks of some gentlemen of that party, it was evident that they considered office holders as a distinct body, entirely separated from the people. Now he was surprised to hear such a position assumed in relation to office holders, who were indirectly appointed by the people themselves. Did not the people elect the President, to whom belonged the power of appointing to office, and in that way were not the office holders appointed by the people, through their President? For his part, he could not believe it was a disgrace to any man when he accepted an office from a President chosen by the people, and in whom they confided that trust. So instead of the office holders being a body distinct from the people, they were appointed and held their office through the people. The individuals who held official stations under Government, did not, thereby, as was maintained by some, lose the rights they had before their appointment. On the contrary, they still were a part of the people, and it was an insult to the people for gentlemen to contend that such was not the case.

Mr. A. then alluded to the bill introduced by Mr. BELL, providing for the freedom of elections, and which provided that office holders should not interfere in elections in any way whatever, under very severe penalties. Here, then, said Mr. A. is a bill, which declares that those holding office directly from the people of this country, are not a part of the people. Mr. A. went on to comment on the extreme injustice of such a bill, and the blow it aimed at the rights of a portion of the people. He showed that under the operation of that measure, a man holding the smallest office under Government could not write or express his opinion on any election before the people, without being subjected to severe penalties. He asked how such a system would work, when, for instance, there might a contest arise between the people and a powerful moneyed corporation? It would be very competent and proper for the numerous clerks of such a moneyed institution to vote and exercise all the influence they might possess. But at the very same time, the numerous body of clerks and other office holders throughout the country, in the employ of Government, could not even open their mouths, much less to vote, in such a contest. No one would attempt to deprive the numerous officers of a great moneyed institution from voting or taking any part in politics they chose. But the office holders appointed by the people, through their President, must be disgraced, disfranchised, and deprived of the inestimable rights of freemen. Yes, gentlemen of the Opposition would make it appear that it was a deep disgrace for a man to receive office from a President chosen by the people. According to their doctrine, the moment a man accepted office, that moment he lost the rights of a citizen, that moment he was disqualified, and the broad mark of disgrace branded upon his forehead.

A man might speak with the eloquence of a Cicero, or with the force of a Demosthenes; he might write with a pen that would carry conviction to every mind. But notwithstanding all this, his hand must be motionless, or his tongue silent, for the great crime of accepting an office under a Democratic Republican Government, an office conferred upon him by a President chosen by the People.

Mr. A. after some futher illustration, showing the evil tendency of the bill, read an extract from an address delivered by Bancroft of Boston, on the principles of Democracy. He said the gentleman in question was one of those office holders, which the bill sought to disqualify from speaking or writing; he was a gentleman of great literary fame, whose history of this country alone would immortalize him, and who had the "audacity" to deliver a political address at Hartford. He supposed the gentleman from Tennessee would contend that this office holder, in so doing, was going out of the ordinary walks of life; but he (Mr. A) thought otherwise. In his opinion, so long as an officer did not neglect his duty, it was not going out of the ordinary walks of life to exercise his talents for the good of his country.

Mr A. then read a long extract from the address alluded to, after which he asked whether gentlemen would wish to disqualify a man capable of such a composition.

Mr. A. then adverted to a variety of other subjects, and in the course of his remarks, said he conceived the great question between parties to be the question of responsible, and irresponsible power. He commented at some length on a speech delivered by Mr. BELL, in which the latter had contended that to the office holders might be traced the origin of all the evils which afflicted the people, and in which he had alluded to the people as mere machines. Mr. A. thought that if the gentleman had such an opinion of the mass of the people, the wonder was, not that he had attempted to deprive those chosen by the people of the right to speak, but that he did not go further, and deprive the people themselves of that right. He then alluded to the charges brought against the late President Jackson, and the present Executive, as holding the doctrine of irresponsibility to the people. He would ask, if the President were not responsible to the people, of what use was it for the people to exercise their power of election? If an officer elected by the people was not responsible to that people, we might just as well have a monarch or a President for life.

Mr. A. in the course of his speech, alluded to the refusal of General Harrison and his committee to permit his sentiments to be known. He then proceeded to show that it would be impossible for a President to be held responsible to the people, unless his sentiments were known. Notwithstanding all that had been said of the abstemious qualifications of General Harrison—of his living on hard cider, &c.—he (Mr. A.) was sure the people would not be deceived by such hurras. The people were more intelligent than to fall into such a trap. They would not pay homage to a veiled candidate, lest, when the veil came to be removed, they should discover they had been worshipping a monster.

Mr. A. alluded to the speech of Mr. CUSHING, on a former occasion, when that gentleman said that "he thought, through the present gloom, he saw the Aurora of a brighter day," and in which he had alluded to the wished for triumph of his party in the New England States, as "the star of the East." Mr. A. reminded the gentleman that, on that occasion, he had also made some predictions in relation to that "star of the East," and had prophesied that, when the true issue should be made, that star would prove an ignis fatuus. He had told the gentleman that it was a delusive hope, and that the Democracy of the North would, when the proper moment should arrive, rise as one man.

He thought that recent events should have taught the Whig party a little useful experience, but he was sorry to say that they had received no benefit; nor had they availed themselves of the salutary lessons those events were calculated to teach. They reminded him of what Napoleon said of the Bourbons: "that, amidst all their vicissitudes, they had learnt nothing, and had forgotten nothing." So it was with the Opposition. Recent events had taught them nothing, and, with a strange infatuation, they were raising a fabric, whose dome they imagined would reach to heaven. But, amidst all this delusion, the people were looking quietly on, awaiting, in calm confidence, until their hour for exertion should arrive. And he would tell the gentleman that, when that hour did arrive, the people would arise and gloriously vindicate their rights. They would write in CAPITALS OF FIRE the noble truth, that man is capable of self-government. Yes, they would rise in their might, and, in a moment, scatter to the winds an unholy, a disjointed, and corrupt Confederacy.

Mr. MASON went into an examination of the course of debate by the friends of the Administration. He said he saw in that course a concerted plan on their part to revive old party distinctions, and to identify the opponents of the present Administration with the old Federal party. He considered it highly unpatriotic and illiberal. He endeavored to prove that that party lost its political organization at the conclusion of the war; that the parties as they were at that time organized, resolved themselves into their original elements. He then read the letter of General Jackson to President Monroe, in which he recommended that his appointments should be made without distinction of party. He commented upon that letter, and commended it as highly patriotic. The policy of confining Executive appointments to a particular party, robbed the country of the services of valuable men. General Jackson had invited that party to his support; and after his election to the Presidency, took care of them, by liberally bestowing offices upon them. His principal advisers at one time were of that party; but the party now, with the Globe at their head, were flouting and denouncing the Whigs as Federalists. They now repudiated this doctrine and condemned this practice of President Jackson. His great objection to the Administration party was, that they preached Democracy and denied the practice. They shouted the hero of Orleans, and denounced his precepts. He adverted to the Sub-Treasury, and denounced it, contending that it would operate injuriously to the interests of the country; he said tha although it was not passed into a law, that it had been in practical operation for three years.

He complained of and censured the course of Mr. Bancroft, the officer at the customs at Boston, who it seemed had spoken to influence the elections at Massachusetts; and had also written a certain treatise on Democratic principles, which had been commended by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON.] Mr. M. was understood to condemn it as an unwarrantable interference of an office holder to influence the elections. He spoke generally of such influence, and of the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] to prevent the interference. He thought, if the justification in the argument of of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] should obtain, and become a settled principle, that the passage of such a bill would become necessary. In speaking of the responsibility of the President, he said that officer was not responsible to the people; but was amenable to the House as the grand inquest of the nation. The only power which the people had was to refuse to re-elect. He went into an argument to show that the Federal office holders should not interfere in the elections; because they were not responsible to the people, but to the source from which they derived their appointment. He then spoke of the banking system, and the favorable condition of the exchanges under the Bank of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor, and spoke at some length, for the purpose of identifying the old Federal party of New York with the present Administration, and contended that Gen. Jackson had made some of his most prominent appointments from that party. He was understood to say that such was the Federalism of the party, at the head of which Martin Van Buren stood in 1820, that a large number of the most ultra anti-war and Federal party came out with a manifesto and joined with Mr. Van Buren. He believed they were then called the forty thieves, among which was William Price, who lately left this country a defaulter, and who was still an adherent of the present Administration.

Mr. JONES of New York rose and asked his colleague if he was quite certain that William Price was one of the Federal highminded men that came over to the Republican party in 1820, remarking that he held in his hand the ancient manifesto published in that year, but he was unable to find in the list of the signers the name of William Price, and added, that he knew of but one out of the forty Federal gentlemen who is now a friend of this Administration.

Mr. MORGAN resumed, and made some remarks on various other topics, particularly the expenses of Government, and the principles of Mr. Van Buren as compared with Gen. Harrison.

Mr. RARIDEN replied to the arguments on the several topics which had been indulged in, in the discussion on this bill. He went into an examination of the causes of the defeat of the Cumberland road bill, and endeavored to prove that the responsibility of the defeat rested with the Administration. He said that if it had been an Administration measure, it would have passed; from which he inferred that the Executive was opposed to the road. Mr. R. examined the claims of General Harrison to the Presidency, and was understood to argue that he was possessed of such principles as would bring into the Treasury of the nation means adequate to construct objects of internal improvement, particularly the Cumberland road.

Mr. CLIFFORD obtained the floor. He did not know the intention of the committee in relation to the action on the bill; but it was his wish to make some remarks upon it. It was past ten o'clock; and—

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts hoped the gentleman would give way for a motion for the committee to rise; and Mr. CLIFFORD having yielded, Mr. CALHOUN made that motion.

Mr. PROFFIT objected. He wished to speak, and was willing to proceed, late as the hour was.

Tellers being demanded on the motion, Messrs. RAMSEY and GIDDINGS were appointed such, who reported, ayes 27, noes 71: no quorum voting.

The committee rose, and its chairman reported that fact to the House; and,

After some remarks from Mr. EVANS, going to show that it would be impossible to get the bill out of committee that night, he moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Virginia demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were, yeas 43, nays 88. So the House refused to adjourn.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. CLIFFORD then took the floor, and spoke at great length. In the course of his remarks, he read a number of extracts from various papers, to prove that whatever might have been the change of name, or course of action, the principles of the two great parties remain the same.

Mr. C. then went on at some length to define the principles which governed the Democratic party, and those by which the old Federal and present Whig party were influenced.

He adverted to the tariff question, the public lands, a National Bank, and other important subjects over which the line of demarcation was drawn between the two parties. He then went on to show what were the views of General Harrison on these subjects, and that in case of his election, it must be expected that he would favor a high tariff, a National Bank, and the appropriation of the public money for internal improvements. Nothing else could be expected from his past course, which was the only, and perhaps the best, criterion for judging. But if the friends of Harrison thought otherwise, why did they not come at once to the issue, and give a direct answer to the questions? If the hero himself was not permitted to speak, why did not his friends speak for him? But experience had proved that such was a vain expectation, for when they were asked if their candidate was in favor of a National Bank, they would answer, "hard cider." If they were desired to state what were his views in relation to the tariff, a cry was raised about "log cabin" and the "poor man's friend."

Mr. C. then went on to say that the working classes had more intelligence than to be duped by such shallow trickery; that they would hold no candidate as their friend, who steadily refused to let them know what his opinions were on subjects to them of the highest importance.

Mr. DILLET obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise; which question was taken by tellers, [Messrs. PRENTISS and CRABB acting as such.] Result, ayes 41, noes 49—no quorum voting.

The committee rose, and its chairman reported that fact to the House—it being now half-past 11 o'clock.

Mr. PROFFIT moved a call of the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved that the House adjourn; and

The yeas and nays having been demanded, were ordered, and were—yeas 53, nays 53.

The SPEAKER voted in the affirmative; and

The House accordingly, at 12 o'clock, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, April 25, 1840.

Mr. JENIFER said that, a few days ago, Executive documents on the subject of tobacco had been sent to the House, in reply to the resolution of the 9th of March. Instead of moving that the whole of them be printed, he had been instructed by the Select Committee on Tobacco to ask leave to have such extracts printed as they might think proper.

Which leave was granted.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the consideration of the motion made yesterday by Mr. CRAIG, to print ten thousand extra copies of the report of the majority and minority of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, in relation to Virginia Revolutionary claims.

Mr. BANKS moved that five thousand, instead of ten thousand, be printed.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia moved that two thousand be printed.

And the several questions having been taken, two thousand extra copies of the said reports were ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked leave to submit a report from the Committee on the Public Buildings, and said it was a matter of great importance.

Mr. CARR objected, and hoped that committees would make their reports in regular order.

The SPEAKER then called upon the several committees for reports, when

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported Senate bill, No. 64, for the relief of Joseph Campan, without amendment. Also, from the petition of inhabitants of Alton, in Massachusetts, for a repeal of the duty on foreign spirits, and that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Also, from the petition of citizens of the United States for a duty on imported silks, and from the petition of umbrella makers in the city of New York, and that said petition be referred to the Committee of the Whole. Also, from the petitions of the manufacturers of starch in the cities of Philadelphia and New York, Also, from the petition of cigar manufacturers in Providence, Rhode Island, and that it lie on the table.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to continue certain clerks employed in the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. B. stated that the committee had had under consideration the message of the President and the accompanying statement, which had satisfied them that it was necessary to continue the employment of these clerks, (two in number;) and, as the law under which they were employed would expire in a few days, he hoped that the House would act now on the resolution, and, if necessary, go into committee.

In answer to an inquiry, the SPEAKER declared that the resolution must be committed, unless, by general consent, the House would dispense with its commitment.

And the House having, by general consent, agreed to do so, the resolution, having been ordered to a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CROSS, from the same committee, reported a bill to provide for running the northern boundary line of the tract of land reserved for the use of the half-breeds of the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Two-thirds not voting therefor, it was consequently rejected.

Mr. T. also reported a joint resolution for the benefit of certain widows of Revolutionary soldiers; which being read the second time, Mr. T. moved that the bill be passed to its third reading.

Mr. J. W. JONES hoped that it would not be forced through in this hasty manner. It was due to the House that an opportunity should be afforded to examine into the existing laws, as it would require five or six millions of dollars to satisfy those intended to be provided for by this bill.

Mr. TALIAFERRO said it was entirely in his power to obviate all objections.

Mr. CRAIG remarked that he would show the operation of this bill, and would state a case.

Mr. STANLY objected, and,

The SPEAKER announced the special order of the day.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY of Illinois in the chair,) on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840.

Mr. DILLETT was entitled to the floor, but yielded it to enable

Mr. MORGAN to make a personal explanation.

Mr. DILLETT then addressed the committee at great length, in a critical examination of the benefits of the Sub-Treasury scheme. He contended that it would be more expensive to the Government, for additional officers, than was apparent upon the face of the bill; and that there were sufficient officers now to collect the revenue. He thought the Treasury, as at present organized, was abundantly adequate to collect and disburse the revenues: that this bill was unnecessary, on the ground that there was nothing to put away, or to take care of: that the demands upon the Government were always in advance of the resources it had on hand to meet said demands. Even if the bill passed, it was nothing more than the Treasury of the United States at last. That the Treasury, as now organized, was under the control of law; but the Sub-Treasury bill, though it may be guarded in its provisions, would be in effect placing under the control of the President of the United States the treasure of the nation, on the ground that he would have the appointment of the officers to carry out the system. It was a proposition, he said, to make a bankrupt Treasury an independent Treasury. He also contended that the treasure of the nation was under the control of law when in the Bank of the United States, but since that time it was not. So soon as the bill passed, it would place an additional value on specie, and to that degree tend to depreciate paper; and would, in the same degree, derange the currency and prove detrimental to commerce. He also contended that the system would prove impracticable, had not the Treasury Note bill been passed—that the Government could not be carried on six months under that system, without the aid of the Treasury Note bill.

Mr. D. then went into an historical examination of the condition of the currency under the Bank of the United States; contending that it was better regulated under that institution than any other system; that the exchanges were more equal. The currency was more uniform and valuable when that institution was in existence; because the State institutions were compelled to be limited to a proper issue; that they were restricted to the issue of a limited proportion of notes to the specie in their vaults. The State banks then had somebody to settle up their accounts for them. Yes, it was this "monster" that prevented the Democratic institutions from running the country into ruin. It prevented these State institutions from depreciating the currency of the States. Mr. D. then went into a long argument to prove the beneficial effects of a Bank of the United States and its constitutionality.

Mr. D. continued his remarks till past 4 o'clock, when he gave way to

Mr. UNDERWOOD, who moved that the committee rise, and the question being put, there were—ayes 49, nays 40; no quorum voting.

The committee rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired of the CHAIR whether he could make a report from the Select Committee on the Rencontre.

The CHAIR said if there was no objection, the report would be received.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected. It was an irregular way of doing business.

Mr. McKAY moved a call of the House; upon which the yeas and nays having been ordered, were—yeas 58, nays 38.

The call having been proceeded in for a short time, it was then, by universal consent, dispensed with; when

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Select Committee appointed to report the facts of the unpleasant rencontre between Messrs. BYNUM and GARLAND of Louisiana, made a report containing a statement of facts, based on the written testimony of a number of witnesses; which testimony accompanied the report. The committee recommended no resolution, nor did they accompany the narrative with a single remark, conceiving it their duty to confine themselves to a naked statement of the facts as they occurred. It will be published hereafter.

The report having been read,

On motion of Mr. BUTLER of Ky. the report and testimony were ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DUNCAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 54, nays 41.

So the House, at 4½ o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, April 27, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 27, 1840.

The journal having been read,

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina rose and asked leave to make a statement relative to a matter personal to himself.

No objection being made,

Mr. CAMPBELL referred to a part of Mr. JENIFER'S lately published speech relative to proceedings in the Committee of Elections, and read a clause to which the report stated that Mr. J. had asked an answer to some inquiry put by him to Mr. C. "without equivocation."

If such a term had been used by the gentleman when speaking, it had escaped the ear of Mr. C.; and when he had read it in the report, he had had an explanation with the gentleman from Maryland, which he was happy to say was of a character entirely satisfactory. He disclaimed every thing like intentional ambiguity in his language on that and on all occasions.

Mr. JENIFER said the statement now given by the gentleman from South Carolina was correct. Such an explanation had taken place, and it was entirely satisfactory on both sides. In preparing the report of that speech, Mr. J. had made use, in part, of the notes of the Reporter, and in part of his own; and, on consulting the notes, he found that the word "quibble" was there written, and not the word equivocation. Whichever word he had actually employed, he had not meant it in any personal or offensive sense.

THE PRIVILEGE REPORT.

The SPEAKER announced the report of the Select Committee on the difficulty which had occurred between Messrs. BYNUM and GARLAND to be the business first in order.

Mr. BRIGGS stated to the CHAIR that, although the report, and the documents accompanying it had been ordered to be printed he did not find it on the tables of members; and, on inquiry, had ascertained that it had not been sent to the Printer; why, he did not know, and wished to understand.

Mr. CAMPBELL then asked permission to say a word in relation to the report made on Saturday, on the subject of the recent unpleasant affair which had taken place in the House between Messrs. BYNUM and RICE GARLAND. He said it would be recollected that the vote on the motion to print the report and testimony, was taken just as the House was on the point of adjournment, and that the motion was agreed to, in a great measure, sub silentio. As for himself, he believed he did not vote, except in that way. Now, upon reflection, he was convinced that no benefit could accrue from the printing of that report, nor would it reflect any credit on the House. If the House had felt disposed to punish for contempt, it appeared to him that it should have been done upon the spot, as was the practice in our courts of justice. With these views, if it was in order, he would move a reconsideration of the vote by which the report and accompanying testimony had been ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGGS hoped the motion would not prevail; many false, imperfect, garbled accounts of the occurrence had gone to the public, and it was necessary that a true and authentic account should be given.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, said that the motion to reconsider gave him an opportunity to say what he ought to have said, and should have said at the time, had this not have precluded by the course immediately adopted by the House; and the observations of some gentlemen, afterwards made, were such as forbade him then to offer what he had now to say. The committee had performed the duty assigned it, and had reported the facts of the case as the members of the committee understood and believed them to have occurred, but had recommended no course of action thereon. He would take this opportunity to say that the affair had happened very suddenly, so much so that one moment before it took place he had not had the remotest expectation of any thing of the kind. Members of that House, who had known him during the seven years he had held a seat in it, could not suppose it to have been his deliberate purpose to do any thing disrespectful to the House. Whether, in what he had done, he had been wright or wrong, it was for the House and not for him to say; he certainly, however, had been himself under the impression at the time that it was right, and under that impression he had acted; but, in a few moments after, he had felt convinced that this was not the place for such an act. Under the impulse of the instant, he had certainly done what, according to the strict interpretation of the rules, was a contempt of the House, although he was far from having had any such intention. If the course lately adopted by the House [Mr. G. was understood to allude to the passage of the anti-duelling regulation] had been such as to impress the members of Congress with the idea that they were not protected from insult by its authority, but that every gentleman must protect himself, it was not Mr. G's fault. Such an impression did exist, and to a great extent. He concluded by repeating the declaration that he had harbored no intention of disrespect to the House.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired whether Mr. CAMPBELL's motion to reconsider embraced both the report and testimony?

Mr. CAMPBELL said it applied to both.

Mr. F. then said he should oppose the motion. If the report was thought to give the facts correctly, there might be no necessity of printing the testimony, but he never would consent to suppress the printing of the report. The case was one which had an important bearing on the decorum and dignity of the House, and they ought, in deciding upon it, to have the report before them.

Mr. PETRIKIN, after some remarks on the habitual disregard of order in the House, was understood to say that the less there was said about this affair, the better it would be for the dignity and reputation of the House. He hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail, and that none of the papers would be printed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL was opposed to the motion. He hoped the House would not reconsider its vote for the printing. It was evident that a thousand distorted versions of the affair had gone forth to the country, and it was due to the House and the parties implicated to have the truth made known. The letter writers would no doubt do injustice to the parties; and it therefore became necessary that the truth, and the whole truth, should appear. He had heard no good reason advanced in favor of the motion to reconsider, nor did he believe there could be any. He hoped the House would have the whole matter printed.

Mr. CURTIS rose to a point of order. He understood the gentleman from South Carolina to say that he did not vote on the motion to print: and that being the case, he did not see how he could move a reconsideration.

The SPEAKER understood the gentleman from South Carolina had voted affirmatively, although sub silentio.

Mr. BANKS concurred with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] in his opinion that the report ought to be printed. It could not be doubted but that erroneous versions of the affair would go forth to the country. It was, therefore, highly necessary to have the whole printed, so that the matter might be laid before the country in an official form, when the people could form their own opinion. Mr. B. then moved the previous question, which was seconded by the House.

The main question being then ordered on the motion to reconsider, it was decided as follows: yeas 20, nays 143. So the House refused to reconsider.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow.

The CHAIR announced that the next business in order was the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWENEY] to reconsider the vote, by which leave was refused the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to introduce a bill to vest the appointment of district attorneys and marshals of the United States in certain courts, and providing that the emoluments of said officers shall in no case exceed $3,000.

Mr. SWENEY, who was entitled to the floor, rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I did not make this motion for the purpose of affording myself an opportunity of making a speech. I did not intend it at the time the motion was made, and although some time has since elapsed, yet I do not now intend it. The legitimate subjects for discussion under this motion, whatever they might be upon the bill itself, it appears to me are too much circumscribed in their extent and character to afford me that opportunity even if I now felt such a disposition; and, as I am not one of those who believe, or practise as though they did believe, that, under every possible question that can arise in this House, every possible matter is debatable, I shall content myself with offering, in very few words, a very few reasons why I have made this motion.

My first object then is to afford to myself and to some others, I hope, who have had an opportunity of reflecting upon the provisions and tendency of this bill, an opportunity of changing our votes.

Sir, it did appear to me, on a moment's reflection, as not altogether courteous, and I have since learned, from older members than myself, that it has not been considered as courteous, especially in this House, where courtesy and urbanity are so much regarded, to refuse to any gentleman leave to introduce a bill, under the rules of the House, where the subject is proper for legislative action.

I have stated, on a former occasion, that I was under the impression, at the time I gave my vote, that the rules of the House would have to be suspended in order to grant the privilege to introduce the bill. This would have been a sufficient reason for withholding my consent, as in that event I would much rather have preferred its being introduced at some other period in order and in compliance with the rules of the House. Sir, I am averse to the suspension of the rules except on very extraordinary, important, and urgent occasions. For little, unfortunately, little as they have been regarded during this session, yet I have found them of some small service in preventing us from running into utter licentiousness.

It has long since been observed, and well observed, that order is the first law of Heaven, and just in proportion as we approach that divine and harmonious order do we secure "peace on earth and good will towards man."

But, sir, the bill is to be introduced without any infraction of the rules of the House. Why, then, may it not be introduced and referred to an appropriate committee? What are its provisions, and what are the evils which it is intended to remedy?

It proposes two things. First, to vest the appointment of district attorneys and marshals in certain courts of the United States. Sir, I am not well satisfied that this change would be for the better. The appointment of these officers is now vested where the framers of our Constitution, those master workmen in political economy, thought proper to place the appointing power—under the General Government; and for this reason alone I would not disturb it, unless for very special and cogent reasons. I cannot see, and I never yet have found, any danger to be apprehended from an improper exercise of the appointing power. I can hardly conceive of corruption there, as long as our Constitution is preserved inviolate. The Chief Magistrate is responsible to the people, and the Senate is to interpose its constitutional check. With this provision of our Constitution, as with all others, I am well satisfied; and although I may not be permitted to say of it as some do of the British Constitution, that "it is the perfection of human wisdom," yet this I may exultingly say of it, that it has secured the greatest amount of human happiness to the greatest number of human beings of any system of Government policy the world has ever adopted.

If, however, any good reason can be assigned for the change, I am willing to adopt it. I am not so great a stickler for form as to lose sight of substance; and while other sciences are progressing with colossal strides, I am willing to admit that some improvement may yet be made in that which is of most importance to his happiness, the government of man.

But, Mr. Speaker, the provision of this bill which is of most importance, in my estimation, is the one limiting the emoluments of District Attorneys. Is it true, sir, that even in our largest commercial cities, that these officers receive twenty, fifteen, or even ten thousand dollars per annum for their services? If so, here must have been a casus omissus in legislation; for I cannot believe that the services of any subordinate officer under our form of Government, can be worth that amount of money; and the creation of sinecures is a most wanton and inexcusable act of despotism, and never ought to be even approached in a Republic. He who will not lend his services to his country for a less amount, let me tell you, his services are not worth having.

Sir, I am not in favor, either, of farming out offices to the lowest bidder. The administration of a Government is of more importance than the Government itself. It has been said by one in former days, who well understood the human character, that "that Government which is best administered is best;" and this is as true as any axiom in philosophy. What signifies our boasted Constitution, if its salutary provisions for our national prosperity and happiness is to remain an inert, dead letter? The proper exercise of its functions must give it life and a fair compensation; for service is the life-giving principle. Our Government, like any other, if badly administered, may run into despotism; if unadministered, must sink into anarchy.

There are two ways by which it may be maladministered—by a mistaken parsimony, by which will be excluded from it administration a sufficient amount of talent, ability, and manly worth, and by allowing excessive salaries, which will always beget extravagance and corruption. A proper medium is to be observed. "In medio tutissimus ibis," is a safe maxim; and under that rule alone can we expect to preserve a healthful and proper action in our Government.

If, then, gentlemen are serious in their professions of economy, here they may find an undisputed point from which to take up their line of march in their holy crusade. Here they may try their whetted pruning knives, without much danger of injuring the tree, or at all affecting the fruitfulness of its branches.

The question being on the motion to reconsider,

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays, which were not ordered.

So the motion was reconsidered; and the question recurring on the motion for leave, it was granted without a count; and the bill was introduced, read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. DILLET, who was still entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks in relation to the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States, and in opposition to the Sub-Treasury scheme. In speaking of General Jackson, he said if there was any one thing, more than another, which was calculated to give him fame in history, it was the proclamation accompanying the force bill. He was in favor of that proclamation, and opposed to any one State resistance, to put an end to the Confederacy. He examined into the political history of General Harrison, and contrasted it with that of Mr. Van Buren, and approved the principles of the former and condemned those of the latter. After passing an eulogy on the character and military services of General Harrison, he concluded.

Mr. STANLY obtained the floor, and said he had a wish to make a few remarks, but he would yield his right to the floor for the purpose of having action on the bill; and hoped gentlemen would consent that the reading of the bill should be progressed with.

Mr. DROMGOOLE concurred most fully in the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] and would attempt to effect the very object which that gentleman had proposed. Every gentleman must see the propriety of observing the rules which the House had prescribed for the transaction of business. The 118th rule required that they should read section by section, so that every item might be analyzed and scrutinized. How could they ever proceed to examine particular items, if the rule were not adhered to?

Mr. D. was glad that, at last, either a sense of propriety, or shame, had induced the committee to evince a disposition to examine the bill. If there were no amendment offered to any section, the next could be read, and each item strictly examined. Besides, our duty under the rules of the House, (said Mr. D.) required that we should look to the situation of the country, and the individuals for whose payment the bill provides. We were doing gross injustice by not making an appropriation for the clerks and other dependants of the Government, who are absolutely driven to the necessity of being shaved by the brokers in anticipation of their payment. He hoped, therefore, they would proceed, without, further delay, to examine into the merits of this bill. It was now quite time to forbear making political speeches, and manufacturing public sentiment. While urging the committee to do their duty, he would not set an example by detaining them. In endeavoring to enforce the rules of the House, he did not impute more blame to one party than another. All must consider that the digression had been sufficiently indulged in. It was the duty of all to prevent any further unnecessary consumption of time. This remark would apply to every body of every party; and Mr. D. called upon all to unite with him to preserve the debate within the limits of order.

Mr. JONES rose for the purpose of showing the importance of speedy action on the bill.

Mr. BELL thought the gentleman from Virginia had taken to himself a great deal of credit in relation to the bill. For his part, he had not hitherto opened his mouth, as was the case with a hundred other gentlemen besides. Mr. B. was understood to complain that the bill had not been brought forward at an earlier period, as he had intended to speak on some of the items. But, as he did not suppose there was time now for debate, he was willing to forego his intended remarks, and go with the honorable gentleman for action on the bill.

Mr. JONES said he desired to have the papers read, which he had received, for the purpose of showing the urgent necessity for speedy action on the bill. In reference to the bill not being brought forward at an earlier period, he begged leave to say that no exertion had been spared on his part to bring up the bill at the earliest possible period.

The several papers from the Departments urging the passage of the bill were then read by the CLERK.

Mr. HUBBARD made some brief remarks in relation to the speech of his colleague, [Mr. DILLETT,] who had at last made up his issue in opposition to the Sub-Treasury. When the proper time should arrive, and the Sub-Treasury bill be under discussion, he hoped he should be able to satisfy his colleague by replying to him on that point. Mr. H. also adverted to some remarks of his colleague in relation to the tariff question, but in which it appeared, from a subsequent explanation of the latter, that he had misapprehended him.

Mr. PROFFIT made a few remarks, and gave notice of his intention, this evening, to make a speech on the bill.

Mr. ADAMS said he had determined, from the first day the bill under consideration was put into Committee of the Whole, that he would not delay the passage of the bill one quarter of an hour. Yet he had much to say. And the House would consider that in discussing the incidental expenses interwoven in the sections of the bill, a sort of challenge had been thrown out, personally to himself, to review the political history of parties from the first day of our independence. For he should go back to that period if he should enter upon that subject, and he might trace the history of that part of the Hartford Convention with which he had something to do; and he would allude to the crying sins imputed to him of advocating internal improvements to the extent of the reading of long passages from a message, which, some ten or fifteen years ago, he sent to this House; also upon his denial of the duty of members of the House to be palsied by the will of their constituents, and of his ardent desire to build light-houses in the skies, and of many other things too tedious to enumerate. And all this had been brought forward to determine how long the clerks in the public offices should be delayed for the payment of the compensation due to them. Mr. A. would ask, whether the House did not think he had sufficient reason to justify himself. He would not begin now; it would take up too much time. He might, besides, be under the necessity of encroaching upon the time of the eloquent gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT.] He (Mr. A.) would not have time before three o'clock in the morning to begin. But he would say now, simply, that he should wait for some other bill, on which the House would be in Committee of the Whole, which would allow of gentlemen speaking to the point at issue, not extraneous matter. He hoped he would have, at that time, the opportunity of addressing the House not so many hours as he would necessarily occupy now.

Mr. H. hoped his friend from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] would not carry his threat into execution then, because, to use a vulgar expression, "fair play is a jewel," and he should reflect upon it before he passes into the execution of his threat, calling gentlemen to order for irrelevancy in debate. Mr. A. said he would not trouble the House now with the history of the Hartford Convention, according to his view of it, nor any thing else. The gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON,] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. CLIFFORD,] having given a history of it, would be a sufficient reason for him to discourse upon the same topic, but he should not speak of it now. He hoped he would have liberty to say a word in extenuation of his crimes; but he would not occupy the time of the House at present.

Mr. A. hoped to have that privilege at any time, when the House shall be in Committee of the Whole. He believed that he had not taken up more than five minutes in this statement; and according to his promise, he would not delay the passage of the bill a moment longer.

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out the compensation to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, being the sum of $3,500, on the ground of certain charges which had been preferred against that officer in the report of the Swartwout Investigating Committee.

Mr. JONES said that before the House undertook to strike out that section of the bill, he hoped gentlemen would vote for the appointment of a committee for the purpose of investigating the charges against the Comptroller. For his part, he had not until then heard any charges against that officer, nor did he know of any; but he thought, at least, some measure ought to be adopted to ascertain the facts before the salary of the officer was stricken out. There was no charge brought against the humblest individual which did not first undergo an investigation; and surely the Comptroller was entitled to an examination before they proceeded to such an extremity against him. Was it not due to him that he should be notified of the charges, before they took that short mode of displacing him? Even the smallest claim that was presented to the House, underwent an examination before a committee; but here was a charge brought up without the least notice, and action was sought thereon without giving the accused the slightest chance of meeting it. It seemed to him a very strange course for the gentleman from North Carolina to move to strike out the salary of a high officer in the Treasury Department, without the least notice or investigation.

Mr. STANLY referred to the report of the Swartwout committee, and intimated that the charges might be found there.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana was understood to say that if the gentleman from North Carolina had undertaken to expose any impropriety in the conduct of the First Comptroller, he had undertaken a task, the success of which would be very doubtful. But it was necessary to the Government that we should have a First Comptroller; and the gentleman's motion would, if agreed to, have the effect of abolishing the office. If there was any charge against the present incumbent, that was another matter, and might be investigated. Or if the gentleman wished to reduce the salary, or abolish the office, that would be in order; but, under present circumstances, the only course was to pass the item.

Mr. WAGENER denied that any charge could be established against the First Comptroller; and, so far as the defalcations of Swartwout were concerned, it was well known that the present Comptroller was not appointed until after Swartwout's defalcations had taken place. He defied any member to point out a single case where the Comptroller was to blame. Mr. W. proceeded to say that he had seen a great deal about those defalcations, and when the proper time should arrive, he would make it his duty to expose the matter to the country; and he would tell the gentleman from North Carolina he would then find that when these defalcations had taken place, they had arisen, not from the friends of the present Administration, but from those opposed to it. Mr. W. concluded by repeating that there was no truth in the insinuations made against the Comptroller, and that for his part he was not one of those who would get up and make charges against an individual, unsupported by evidence, if any "inefficiency existed in that office, it was at the last period of Mr. Anderson's service;" when,

Mr. BELL rose, and inquired whether any corrupt conduct was imputed to Mr. Anderson.

Mr. WAGENER promptly replied, most assuredly not. His inefficiency was imputed to his infirmities and old age.

Mr. BELL made no inquiry as to the conduct of Mr. Barker. So far from Mr. W. or the minority of the Swartwout committee, imputing any want of energy to Mr. Barker, they, on the contrary, exculpate him from any blame, and accord to him, in connection with the late Solicitor of the Treasury, much praise for their laborious investigations into the defalcations of Mr. Swartwout, (at the city of New York,) as soon as suspicion was excited of his enormous peculations.

Mr. DAWSON said, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania supposed the majority report contained any charges against the Comptroller not sustained by evidence, he was mistaken. The report charged that officer with culpable disregard of law; and he could show that the charge was fully substantiated. Mr. D. then read the laws applicable to the office of Comptroller, and contended that if the present incumbent had regarded those laws, the defalcations of Swartwout might have been checked. He wished to be distinctly understood as making no charge of corruption against the present officer, but as blaming him only for not enforcing the law; in doing which, however, he was merely following the example of his predecessor. Mr. G. in the course of his remarks, stated that every gentleman in the Treasury Department with whom he had conversed, had admitted that if the accounts with Swartwout had been kept up, in accordance with law, the defalcations must speedily have been discovered.

clerk in the Land Office, at a salary of $1200 a year, and that he farmed the office to some individual for $800 a year, while he was employed as a Reporter for the Globe. Now, all he knew was, that Mr. Washington stood high wherever he was known, as a gentleman whose character and integrity could not be surpassed. He had known Mr. Washington for some time, and he felt it his duty to say that his conduct was correct, and his actions influenced by some of the noblest feelings that adorn our nature. He would vouch for it, that the character of that individual was equal to that of the gentleman from North Carolina in honesty and integrity. Mr. S. then referred the member from North Carolina to a statement published by Mr. Washington in relation to this matter, and which, Mr. S. understood, declared that the substitute who performed the duties in the Land Office recived every dollar of the salary.

Mr. PETRIKIN was opposed to this mode of attacking individuals upon the floor. If there was any thing wrong, the proper course would be to have a fair investigation. The Committee on the Public Expenditures, which was composed of a majority of Whigs, have full power to attend to such matter. If there be any thing wrong, let them investigate and correct it.

Mr. JAMES GARLAND felt himself called upon, as an act of justice to Mr. Washington, to say, upon the authority of the Recorder of the Land Office, that that gentleman does not receive one cent from the Government. His place has been filled by another gentleman, of efficiency and ability, who receives the full salary attached to the office. He could also certify to the ability and highmindedness of Mr. Washington.

Mr. BANKS knew but very little about this business, but he thought himself anthorized to say, from the information he had received, that Mr. W. was not, in fact, a clerk in the Land Office, nor did he receive a cent from the Government as clerk.

Mr. RAMSEY did not approve these discussions got up on an appropriation bill. In relation to Lund Washington, he knew nothing about him, and he cared as little. If gentlemen imagined there was any thing wrong, let these charges be investigated, and he would willingly co-operate with them. But he was opposed to this mode of bringing up individuals before the House. He believed, from what he had heard, that this Lund Washington was an honorable and estimable man, and he hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would see the impropriety of bringing charges, without accompanying them with proof. If there was any suspicion of wrong in any quarter, the only proper mode was, in the first place, to investigate the charges, and not present them to the House upon mere rumor.

There were also charges intimated against a high and worthy Mr. PETRIKIN defended the Comptroller, who, he said, was appointed but two months before Swartwout was turned out of office. The defalcations of Swartwout had commenced years before the present Comptroller came into office; they began as far back as 1832. The gentleman from Georgia had disclaimed any charge of corruption against the Comptroller, but had, at the same time, charged him with a culpable neglect of duty. What was that but corruption? Mr. P. then went on to show how very easy it was to make a charge on the floor against an individual who had no chance of defending himself. As for the present Comptroller, he had known him for years, as an honest, upright man—yes, as honest as any gentleman on the floor. The Comptroller might not, perhaps, be quite so good in point of talent as some members, but he was far better in point of honesty. [Laughter.] But the Swartwout committee not only made him shoulder the blame of his predecessor, but saddled him with the whole crimes of Swartwout and his coadjutors, the banks. Mr. P. then alluded to the manner in which the investigating committee was appointed. He denounced it as a party affair, and complained that the report was kept back until within a few days before the session closed, so that the falsity of its charges could not be shown. Other gentlemen might act as they pleased, but for himself, he would never make a charge against any man on ex parte evidence.

Mr. DAWSON explained that, during the investigation, he had derived much valuable information from Mr. BARKER; and he would repeat that he did not impute to him any thing like corruption, but an unintentional disregard of the law. Mr. D. then read extracts from the majority report, showing, from the Comptroller's answers to interrogatories, that he himself admitted the impossibility of fraud on the part of Swartwout, had the proper checks provided by law been put in force.

After some further debate of a desultory character, the question was taken on the motion to strike out, and it was negatived.

Mr. STANLY then moved to strike out the compensation to the First Auditor of the Treasury; and the question being taken, the motion was disagreed to without a count—when the paragraph for making appropriations to compensate the clerks in the General Land Office was read by the Clerk.

Mr. STANLY wished to ask Mr. JONES whether Lund Washington was still a clerk of the Treasury Department.

Mr. JONES replied that there were some hundreds of clerks in the Departments, and that he had not the pleasure of knowing many of them. He was understood to say that he was unable to say whether Mr. Washington was a clerk or not.

Mr. STANLY then made some further remarks in relation to Mr. Washington, who, he contended, had been a CLERK in the Land Office, and was one of the Reporters of the Globe at the same time.

Mr. ALBERT SMITH said he understood the gentleman from North Carolina to infer that this Mr. Washington was a officer of the Treasury. As to the official transactions of that gentleman, he knew comparatively nothing; but he would say that any charge, impeaching him with culpable neglect, he would denounce as without foundation. He would meet these charges here at the threshold, and defy gentlemen to prove them. He appealed to the House and to the country to say whether it was fair for gentlemen to be attacked here, before they had been even notified of the charges, or had an opportunity of being heard in their own defence. Gentlemen seemed to know a great deal about these defalcations; but as regarded that officer, they had searched in vain, for they had found nothing against him. He would ask, who it was that committed these frauds? He would tell them that the offenders were members of their own party, and that Swartwout was one of their own men; yes, that man, after all had been said, was of their own party, and had been named by them as a candidate for the Vice Presidency.

Mr. STANLY replied at some length, and, in the course of his remarks, denied that Swartwout was nominated for the Vice Presidency by the Whig party.

Mr. RAMSEY referred Mr. S. to the New York Courier and Enquirer, for the purpose of proving that Swartwout had been nominated by a portion of the Whig party. He referred to the time when Swartwout was ordered to collect the public dues in specie only, but which order he disregarded, and received instead the worthless trash of bank paper.

Did the Administration laud him for that? No. But he was praised by the Whigs, and he acted with them, as the New York Courier would show.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. GENTRY, POPE, and RAMSEY, the question was taken on the motion to strike out, and it was rejected.

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out from the item making appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Solicitor of the Treasury, $500 for the purchase of a law library for the use of that office.

A debate ensued, in which Messrs. STANLY, JONES of Virginia, DAVIS of Kentucky, JAMES GARLAND, EVERETT, CUSHING, FILLMORE, PETRIKIN, ADAMS, EVANS, McKAY, and GRAVES participated; when

Mr. STANLY demanded tellers on the question of striking out; and Messrs. HOPKINS and DAVIS of Pennsylvania having been appointed as such, reported—ayes 60, noes 44; no quorum voting.

The committee rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. STANLY moved a call of the House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL raised a question of order, by way of inquiry whether it was the duty of the chairman of the Committee on the state of the Union, under all circumstances, when found without a quorum, to rise; and whether he had no means to ascertain whether there was a quorum of the committee.

Mr. CASEY, the chairman, said there was no other means by which the chairman could ascertain whether there was a quorum, except by the members passing through tellers; that had been done, and no quorum having voted, it was the imperative duty of the chairman to rise and report that fact to the House.

Mr. BRIGGS having called for the opinion of the SPEAKER in relation to the duties of the committee under the circumstances above alluded to,

The SPEAKER stated his opinion in substance, that when the committee found itself without a quorum, it was powerless, and in conformity to its past practice, should rise and report that fact to the House.

The SPEAKER then counted the House to ascertain whether there was a quorum; and there being 127 members present,

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The question was then taken on striking out, as proposed by Mr. STANLEY, and agreed to—ayes 73, noes 57.

Mr. TRIPLETT moved to reduce the contingent expenses of the Secretary of War, from $3,000 to $2,500; and after a few remarks from Messrs. GRAVES and DROMGOOLE, the amendment was rejected without a count.

Mr. GIDDINGS proposed an amendment requiring the heads of the several Departments to present annually, in detail, estimates of the contingent expenses; and after a few remarks by Messrs. JONES of Virginia and R. GARLAND, showing that it would be impracticable; and by Mr. GIDDINGS in favor of the amendment, on the ground that it was absolutely necessary to save the time of the House by preventing discussion when the appropriation bill is under consideration, the amendment was rejected without a count.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to strike out "the compensation of extra clerks, when employed in the War Department, three thousand dollars;" and after a debate, in which Messrs. JONES of Virginia, JENIFER, BELL, CONNOR, PETIKIN, R. GARLAND, and STANLY participated,

Mr. PROFFIT obtained the floor, and spoke at some length in defence of the Whig party, as connected with the question of Abolition. He denied that the Whigs and Abolitionists were identical as a party—but that the Abolitionists belonged to both political parties; or, if they existed as a party at all, they existed as an independent party. The Whig party, it had been said, were made up of discordant materials. He admitted that it was made up of men possessing different principles, but who were willing to merge all minor differences of opinion for the great common purpose of breaking down this Administration. He was understood to say that he would rally on any man, whatever his principles, to effect that great purpose. He examined the pretensions of General Harrison to the Presidency, as compared with those of Mr. Van Buren, contending that the claims of the former were superior to the latter.

Mr. GOODE followed, and, in the course of his remarks, examined the character of the Treasury Note bill, contending that it was not constitutional. He was arguing that the Sub-Treasury system was as much in conflict with popular rights as the banking system. He was about proceeding into an examination of its principles, when

Mr. VANDERPOEL made a point of order. The bill before the committee was the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill; and the gentleman was discussing the Sub-Treasury bill. He therefore called the gentleman to order for irrelevancy of debate.

The CHAIR said that he had, at an early part of the discussion on this bill, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] was called to order for discussing this very question, promptly decided that he was not in order; but the committee thought proper not to sustain the CHAIR. As the question was, however, again raised, he must say that the gentleman from Ohio was not in order to indulge in this irrelevancy of debate. As he was called upon to decide, he must say that the gentleman was out of order; and after a few remarks from Messrs. VANDERPOEL, BROWN of Tennessee, and DAWSON,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS appealed from the decision of the CHAIR on the ground that the House went into Comittee on the state of the Union generally; and particularly the bill before it. The gentleman was therefore perfectly in order in the latitude of discussion he had taken.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama said it was the understanding that the utmost lattitude would be allowed to this bill, and hoped that the gentleman would withdraw his point of order; but on some other bill, the first that should come up, he was determined that irrelevancy of debate should be prevented; and he would raise the question of order, if no other person thought proper to do so.

The question being on the appeal, the committee was divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 25; and no quorum voting,

The committee rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved that the House adjourn; but the yeas and nays having been ordered, he withdrew the motion.

On motion of Mr. STANLY, a call of the House was ordered, and having been proceeded in until 122 members answered to their names, all further proceedings in the same was dispensed with. A quorum being present,

The House again resolved itself into committee, and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic bill.

The question being on the appeal, and Messrs. CARTER and DAVIS of Indiana, having been appointed tellers to take a count reported—ayes 86, noes 22: no quorum having voted.

The committee again rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved a call of the House.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 32, nays 89.

Mr. GOODE intimated to the House that he would not trouble the committee with any further remarks, and hoped the House would again go into committee, and dispose of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS did not think it was proper, after so much irrelevancy of debate as had been indulged in by other members, that the gentleman from Ohio should be put down. He moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER decided the motion was not in order, no action having been had by the House since the question was taken on the motion to adjourn.

The House again went into committee, and resumed the consideration of the bill.

The question being on the appeal, both the appeal and the point of order were withdrawn; when

Mr. GOODE finished his argument in relation to the Sub-Treasury bill, and gave notice that he intended, when that bill came up for consideration, to go more into detail.

Mr. OGLE rose, and was addressing the committee in relation to the furniture in the President's House, and by way of explanation and reply to the two gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Messrs. LINCOLN and ADAMS,] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. JAMESON,] who attacked his former remarks on that subject; but, before he proceeded far,

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi rose to a point of order. He called the gentleman to order for irrelevancy of debate; and put it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. OGLE,] whether it comported with his dignity, and his sense of what was due to the committee, after already occupying three days in discussing this question on the bill now under consideration, to indulge in a debate of this character at this late hour (12½ o'clock.)

The CHAIR again reiterated his former decision—that the gentleman was out of order.

Mr. OGLE was about proceeding, but

Mr. PARRIS objected to his proceeding without permission of the committee.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS appealed from the decision of the CHAIR; and

The question being, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand, as the judgment of the committee?" tellers were called for to take account, and Messrs. LINCOLN and PARRIS having been appointed such, reported ayes 79, noes 24; and no quorum voting,

The committee rose; and

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair,

The chairman of the committee reported that fact to the House.

Mr. PARRIS moved a call of the House.

Mr. WILLIAM B. CALHOUN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 34, nays 85.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. DUNCAN moved a call of the House; which was ordered; and having been proceeded in till 114 members answered to their names.

Mr. FILLMORE said experience had taught him that all attempts to compel the attendance of members, and to force questions, at such an unseasonable hour, proved abortive; he therefore hoped, by universal consent, the House would agree to adjourn, with that understanding, by all parties, that the question should be taken on the bill to-morrow. He accordingly made that motion to adjourn.

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered,

Mr. FILLMORE withdrew his motion.

The call was then proceeded in until 123 gentleman answered to their names; and the list of absentees having been called over for excuses, the following gentlemen were excused for various reasons, viz: Messrs. ANDREWS of Kentucky MARVIN, ANDERSON of Kentucky, BIDDLE, W. O. BUTLER, CAMPBELL of Tennessee, MARK A. COOPER, PROFFIT, DAVEE, FLETCHER, GRANGER, HALL, HOOK, JOHNSON of Tennessee, LAWRENCE, MCCULLOCH, MEDILL, NAYLOR, PARMENTER, PECK, POPE, RAYNER, CHAS. SHEPPARD, REED, SMITH of Indiana, TALIAFERRO, TURNEY, UNDERWOOD, S. WILLIAMS, RHETT, BYNUM, WHITE of Louisiana, EVERETT, PETRIKIN.

The House refused to excuse the following gentlemen, viz. Messrs. ANDERSON, JUDSON ALLEN, BOND, BOTTS, BRIGGS, BROWN, CARROLL, CLARK, CRANSTON, CURTIS, GARRET DAVIS, HOPKINS, KEIM, MARVIN, MONTANYA, STRONG, STEWART, THOMPSON of South Carolina, WISE, WORTHINGTON, and PICKENS.

Mr. DAWSON suggested that it would be better to adjourn now, with the understanding that the question should be taken on to-morrow. He, therefore, moved all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, the question was taken, and disagreed to.

Mr. LINCOLN said there were items in the bill which would necessarily create discussion; and it was obvious that the bill could not be got out of committee to-night; he therefore renewed the motion to suspend all further proceedings in the call.

Mr. McKAY hoped gentlemen would see the reasonableness of the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He hoped the suggestion would be acted upon.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. STEENROD demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, the motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said that, on all former occasions, he had protested against understandings of this kind; and he did so on the present occasion.

Mr. STANLY also protested.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend all further proceedings in the call, and decided in the negative.

Mr. STANLY hoped the House would adjourn, and meet again in the morning. He did not see what good could be effected by remaining there. He had several amendments which he thought it his duty to offer.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved that the absentees be sent for and taken into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. DAWSON appealed to the chairman of Ways and Means whether his experience did not teach him that it would be impossible to get members there before four o'clock, when a call was ordered under such circumstances.

Mr. JONES agreed that we might not get the members there before four o'clock. But he was satisfied that, unless they submitted to privations, they would never get through with the public business.

Mr. CUSHING suggested that it would be very improper to continue the call, and drag members from their beds to decide upon a point of order. If the House consented now to adjourn, that question would not come up before one o'clock; at which time the members would be in a good humor. He appealed to the House whether a quorum could be procured before six o'clock. Even then nothing could be gained by it, as the House must shortly afterwards adjourn to enable members to seek that repose of which they have been so unnecessarily deprived.

Mr. BOYD moved the previous question on the motion to send for the absent members; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CUSHING hoped that the motion might be put in writing, so that there might be a regular and legal call. The call ordered on recent occasions was not legal.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 35, nays 67. So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurring on the motion to send for the absent members,

Mr. FILLMORE suggested a modification of the motion so as to require that the Sargeant-at-Arms should produce the absent members by ten o'clock in the morning, to which time he hoped the House would have a recess.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS of Maryland, the yeas and nays having been ordered on the motion to suspend the motion to send for the absent members, were—yeas 57, nays 37. So the House determined to send for the absent members.

Mr. GRAVES said it was evidently impossible to get through this bill in twelve hours; and moved to reconsider the vote to compel the attendance of members.

Mr. WELLER moved the previous question on that motion; which was not seconded.

Mr. PETRIKIN said as he had been excused, he would, as an impartial man, move to reconsider the vote; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized to compel the attendance of members at 10½ oclock, and that the House take a recess till that hour.

Mr. RIVES thought it was unnecessary to move a reconsideration. He was in favor of compelling not only those who were absent on the first call, but all those who had answered to their names and subsequently absented themselves.

Mr. BANKS thought it would be better that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to have the absentees forthcoming at 11 o'clock. He did not wish to avoid the rule by such suggestion; but to have it executed. He thought it would be better to reconsider the former vote, and adopt a resolution to compel the attendance of the members at that hour.

After a few remarks by Mr. GRAVES,

Mr. DILLET said he felt some indignation that the gentleman several hours ago did not agree to suspend the proceedings in this matter. As they were unwilling then, he was perfectly willing to let them work it out their own way. Let those who were so strenuous some three hours ago, pursue the call, and see what they can make of it.

Mr. STANLY moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 45, nays 50.

So the House refused to reconsider the order to compel the attendance of members.

Mr. RIVES moved that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock.

Mr. CUSHING submitted to the CHAIR, as a point of order, that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] was not in order, the House being in the process of executing an order for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER, in reply to the question of order raised by Mr. CUSHING, said that a motion to adjourn was at all times in order.

Mr. CUSHING submitted that there was a difference between a recess and an adjournment.

Mr KEMBLE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 22, nays 65.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. RIVES moved to take a recess till 10 o'clock.

Mr. CUSHING raised a point of order. The House must either continue or suspend the call. It could adjourn, but not take a recess.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion was not in order.

Mr. HOLLEMAN argued that it was in order, and took an appeal from the decision of the SPEAKER.

Messrs. DROMGOOLE and CUSHING supported the decision of the CHAIR in a few remarks; when

Mr. DUNCAN said that the House was told every day that the Administration had a majority, yet it would be seen that a minority had as much power as that majority. It can render the majority powerless by the course of proceeding adopted this night, and defeat action on the public business. The power of this minority was a negative one, which was equal to a positive power. The circumstances of the country imperiously demand that this bill shall be passed. The public service is suffering throughout every branch; and he was anxious that the country should know what party it was that was now delaying action on the public business.

After a few remarks in opposition to the decision of the CHAIR,

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved the previous question on the appeal; which having been seconded, the main question was ordered; which main question was, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?" and the said question having been put, the decision was sustained.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired if it was in order so to re-order the call as to compel the attendance of those who left the hall after having answered to their names when the roll was first called.

The CHAIR decided that it was not in order to have two calls at the same time.

Mr. FILLMORE took an appeal from that decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. LINCOLN adverted to former precedents in opposition to the opinion of the CHAIR, that all who absented themselves after having answered to their names when the roll was called, were included in the order, and compelled to attend. This was done by first calling over the names again.

After a few remarks by Messrs. BANKS and LEWIS WILLIAMS,

Mr. GRAVES said no good could grow out of this proceeding, and moved all further action in the same be dispensed with.

Mr. HAND appealed to the gentleman whether it was not due to the members who were here, and to facilitate the public business, that the call should be proceeded in. It was the second time that he had been compelled to remain there all night, and more than one half of the members were permitted to absent themselves. He suggested whether the consequence of letting them off at this time would not be taken advantage of hereafter, to a greater extent. I shall insist that the order be fulfilled, and they be compelled to attend. Break up the naps of these quiet gentlemen. Let the Sergeant-at-Arms bring them up, and let them be dealt with them as they merit. Mr. H. concluded by moving the previous question on the motion to suspend the call; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays on the main question; which having been ordered, were—yeas 31, nays 61. So the refused to suspend all further proceeding in the call.

Mr. HABERSHAM suggested that, by the list of yeas and nays just taken, it could be ascertained what members had absented themselves since they first answered to their names, with a view of compelling their attendance.

Mr. DROMGOOLE presumed that the door-keeper did his duty, by preventing gentlemen passing out except on a pledge of return. The presumption was that no gentleman had violated. If they had, he would be for arraigning them for committing an offence against the rule.

Mr. LINCOLN moved an order, in substance, that all the members who had absented themselves since the call was commenced, after having answered to their names, should be taken into the custody of the Sergeat-at-Arms, to be dealt with in the same manner as those who were absent previous to the call.

Mr. GRAVES objected, and raised the point of order, that it was not in order for a minority to do but two acts: to adjourn or to compel the attendance of members. There being but a minority present, they could not adopt this order, or transact any other business.

Mr. FILLMORE argued that if a minority had the right to have a call, they could prescribe the mode to carry out that call. The proposition was clearly in order.

The debate having been further continued by Messrs. TILLINGHAST, LINCOLN, and SMITH of Maine.

Mr. CUSHING demanded the previous question, which was ordered.

Mr. GRAVES then demanded the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered, and were—yeas 61, nays 11. So the order was adopted, and the Sergeant-at-Arms directed to take the absentees into custody.

The name of Mr. BRIGGS being first on the list, he stated that he had no excuse that would be considered valid. He had remained in the House until 11 o'clock.

Mr. RIVES moved that Mr. BRIGGS be discharged on payment of the fees.

Mr. DROMGOOLE opposed the motion. His experience had taught him the fine was in most cases nominal. He thought a proper example ought to be made of those who had thus stayed away all night. Mr. D. then moved to amend the motion, so as to fine Mr. BRIGGS ten dollars, leaving his discharge as an after consideration.

On the motion to amend, Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 46, nays 34. So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then being on agreeing to the motion as amended, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. BRIGGS wished to know, first, where the rule was to be found under which the fine had been inflicted, and, second, whether he was required to pay the money before proceeding to his duties.

Mr. TOLAND being next called, Mr. DROMGOOLE made the same motion in relation to him, as he thought the same fine ought to be exacted from all.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to amend that motion, so as to empower the Sergeant-at-Arms to deduct the amount from the per diem allowance of Mr TOLAND; but subsequently modified it, so that Mr. T. should not be discharged until the fine had been paid.

A long discussion then took place between Messrs. HAND, BRIGGS, VANDERPOEL, RIVES, DROMGOOLE, McKAY, and LEWIS, in relation to the constitutional power of the House to impose a fine exceeding that specified in the rules. Messrs. BRIGGS, HAND, and LEWIS contended, with much earnestness, that the House had no such power. Mr. LEWIS subsequently moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the fine of $10 had been inflicted upon Mr. BRIGGS.

On this motion, Mr. DAVIS of Indiana called the previous question; which was seconded. The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the proposition to fine.

Mr. HAND moved to amend the resolution by striking out the fine of $10, and inserting that Mr. BRIGGS be discharged on payment of the regular fees. This amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, being adopted, Mr. BRIGGS was ordered to be discharged on payment of the fees.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then withdrew his motion in reference to Mr. TOLAND, inasmuch as he considered the vote just taken as giving the sense of the House on the subject.

Mr. TOLAND was then discharged on payment of the regular fees.

The following gentlemen, in the custody of the Sergeant-at Arms, whose excuses were not deemed sufficient, were discharged from his custody by the payment of fees, viz: Messrs. MASON of Ohio, WARREN, GIDDINGS, BROWN of Mississippi, WORTHINGTON, SMITH of Connecticut, SWENEY, W. THOMPSON, ALLEN of Ohio, BELL, GRIFFITH, and STARKWEATHER.

The following gentlemen were discharged without the payment of fees, viz: Messrs. STRONG and HENRY.

The following gentlemen having been returned as sick, were excused, viz: Messrs. BROCKWAY and BUTLER of South Carolina.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HAND demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 25, nays 66.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to dispense with the further proceedings of the call.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MASON hoped the House would go to breakfast. The House could take a recess. We want to shave and wash; hoped the motion would prevail.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, were—yeas 24, nays 60.

So the House refused to dispense with further proceedings in the call.

The following gentlemen were discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, on the payment of fees, viz: Messrs. STORRS, MITCHELL, EVANS, SALTONSTALL, GENTRY, THOMPSON of Mississippi, and JAMESON; and Mr. CRABB was discharged without the payment of fees.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested the propriety of of the House taking a recess, with the understanding that the bill should be disposed of to-day; upon which suggestion Messrs. CLIFFORD and HAND objected, on the ground that all their efforts of the night would prove abortive; and all the arrangements of the kind heretofore made had been violated; it was, therefore, impracticable.

Mr. HAND said, a great many of the members that a few minutes ago had answered to their names, had absented themselves; and hoped they would be taken into custody.

The CHAIR said if the gentleman would name any members, it would be competent to authorize the Sergeant-at-Arms to take them into custody.

Mr. HAND said he could name the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. A. SMITH.] and he would make the motion that he be taken into custody; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRENTISS moved to rescind that order. The gentleman from Maine had been in his seat all night.

Mr. CLIFFORD said his colleague had been there all night, and had just that moment stepped out.

Mr. HAND, for the purpose of ascertaining who had left the hall since they answered to their names, said he would call for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 62, nays 12.

So the order in relation to Mr. SMITH was rescinded.

The following gentlemen, having been called up for excuses, they were heard and deemed unsatisfactory, and were discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms on the payment of fees, viz: Messrs. J. GARLAND, ROGERS of New York, and DANA, when

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved that the House adjourn. On which motion,

Mr. JONES of Virginia demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 20, nays 62.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. McKAY, at about 9 o'clock, a. m. offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to take efficient measures to have the remainder of the absentees before the House at 12 o'clock this day, to wit: Tuesday, the 28th of April, and that the House do now adjourn to that hour.

Mr. McK. hoped that the House would adopt the resolution, and let the members go home to their breakfast, and then they could meet at the time specified in the resolution.

Mr. A. SMITH would ask leave to say a word personal to himself. It was the first time that he had had occasion to do so. After a session of twenty-four hours, without rest, he had left the hall for not more than twenty minutes, to obtain such refreshment as his exhausted strength required. Almost every member who had remained in the hall during the night, had done the same. During this short absence, Mr. S. learned that a member [Mr. HAND] had taken the liberty to propose that he, with two other gentlemen, be sent for and brought into the House. It is a trite maxim, "de gustibus non est disputandum" He had no disposition to dispute any gentleman's right to make himself appear ridiculous before this House and the country. He claimed the right, however, to let his constituents and the country understand the reason that such a vote had been spread upon the records of the House, and he could not the satisfaction which the gentleman might enjoy in having singled him out for arrest by the Sergeant-at-arms under the circumstances named.

Mr. S's only object in rising was to let his constituents understand why he was absent twenty-five minutes from the House.

Mr. HAND said he was aware that nothing could be done in the House, there being only seventy-four members present.

The SPEAKER said that the absentees could not be called without being named; and Mr. H. among other names, had mentioned that to Mr. SMITH.

Mr. McKAY'S resolution was then read; when

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS asked whether it did not require two-thirds to adopt it?

The SPEAKER said it did not.

Mr. HAND thereupon called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; but before they were taken,

Mr. McKAY withdrew the resolution.

After a few moments inaction, and the hour of 9¼ a. m. having arrived,

Mr. CONNER moved that all further proceedings in the call of the House be dispensed with.

Mr. BOYD called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted—ayes 25, noes 67: no quorum voting.

So the call was not dispensed with.

Mr. LINCOLN stating that he had enjoyed no sleep for three nights, and partaken no food since yesterday, asked leave of absence for an hour; which leave was granted.

The SPEAKER then resumed the call upon absentees for their excuses; when

Mr. KEIM, on account of indisposition, and Messrs. STRONG, JAMES, CURTIS, W. C. JOHNSON, CRANSTON, and HENRY, all whose excuses were deemed sufficient, were discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, without the payment of fees.

And the following gentlemen, whose excuses were not deemed sufficient, were discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, upon payment of fees, viz:

Messrs. FORNANCE, DOIG, WELLER, DAWSON, JENIFER, PARRIS, of Ohio, CALHOUN, GOGGIN, GALBRAITH, JOHNSTON of New York, CRAIG, BLACK, HILL of Virginia, DENNIS, HUNT, HILL of North Carolina, SLADE, C. H. WILLIAMS, CROSS, COLQUITT, and WICK.

[Mr. WICK stated that his absence was not of will, but of necessity. That he is liable to attacks of vertigo; that finding himself in danger from the same, not merely of illness, but of death, he left the House at 3 o'clock this morning, with the view of obtaining relief by the usual remedy of being bled.]

Mr. EVERETT made a motion to remit the fines which had been imposed, and that the House adjourn, to meet at 12 o'clock; but the motion being opposed, and the yeas and nays being demanded, Mr. E. withdrew the motion.

Mr. CRANSTON stated that he understood the fines imposed never were exacted from the members, and he moved to remit the fines which had been imposed.

Mr. CUSHING moved to amend the motion by adding, "and also those imposed on the 24th of March last."

The motion was debated by Messrs. DAWSON and SLADE, on the ground that all the fines remitted were taken from the Treasury of the United States; that the operation worked with inequality; some who were absent for weeks at a time, remained unnoticed, while those absent for a single night were fined.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, the motion was laid upon the table.

The report of the Sergeant-at-Arms was read, stating that many members (the names of whom were read) after a most scrutinizing hunt, and the greatest vigilance on his part, could not be detected.

Mr. MITCHELL moved that all further proceedings in the call of the House be dispensed with.

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York moved that the names of absentees be read; when Messrs. GANNELL and CLARK, who were in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, made excuses to the House, which were not deemed satisfactory, and were discharged on payment of fees.

Mr. BLACK moved to suspend all further proceedings in relation to those who were absent from the city, and all who were sick.

The SPEAKER then put the question to suspend all further proceedings in the call of the House; which was disagreed to.

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved that all members now in the city, and absent from the House, be considered in default and fined, and that they be discharged, on making a proper excuse to the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to this proposition as irregular. Men could not be fined, unless in custody, etc.; and

After some conversation between Messrs. SMITH of Maine and BRIGGS,

Mr. TALIAFERRO withdrew his motion.

Mr. CRAIG offered a resolution, to the effect that the absentees whose cases had not been disposed of, be severally called on, when they appeared in the House, to show cause why they should not be fined for their delinquency; which resolution, however, he subsequently withdrew.

Mr. EVERETT moved that all further proceedings in the call of the House be dispensed with; and, on that motion, called for the yeas and nays. After some debate of a conversational character, and having ascertained that the Sergeant-at-Arms had succeeded in capturing another squad of members, the motion was withdrawn by the mover.

The SPEAKER again resumed the call of the absentees for excuses, when

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland was discharged without payment of fees; and Messrs. KING of Georgia, and RUSSELL, were discharged on payment of fees.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved that Messrs. HILL of North Carolina, SLADE, and CLARK, be excused without payment of fees.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 82, nays 51.

So the motion was laid on the table.

Messrs. HASTINGS, PROFFIT, and MORRIS of Pennsylvania were then discharged from custody, on payment of fees.

Mr. LINCOLN begged leave to read a resolution, with a view to obviate the recurrence of scenes like the present.

Leave being granted, the resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House, as a substitute for rule 61, which is hereby rescinded:

61. Whenever a member shall be discharged from custody, and admitted to his seat, unless his absence shall be excused by the House, he shall forfeit for every instance of such unexcused absence, the amount of one day's pay; and, moreover, shall pay the fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or special messenger by whom he shall be sent for or taken into custody. And it shall be the duty of the CLERK of the House, in every such case, immediately thereafter, to certify the name of such absentee to the Sergeant-at-Arms, who shall make corresponding deductions from the pay of the delinquent members, retaining the amount of fees to his own use, or that of the special messenger making the arrest.

The Sergeant-at-Arms shall in no instance make a final settlement of the account of any member of this House, until the day of adjournment of both Houses at the close of the session, unless said member has been excused from attendance by a vote of the House.

Mr. BANKS was understood to say that he was in favor of the resolution, or some proposition of the kind. He thought a penalty should be attached to the practice of gentlemen absenting themselves from the House, to the great detriment of the public business; but he did not think the resolution was in order at that stage of the proceeding.

The CHAIR decided the resolution to be out of order.

Mr. BANKS insisting on his motion, that all further proceedings in the call of the House be dispensed with, it was agreed to; and

The SPEAKER having stated that a quorum was now present,

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic bill.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order was the decision of the CHAIR, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] was out of order for irrelevancy of debate, and from which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. L. WILLIAMS] had taken an appeal.

The CHAIR then put the question, whether the decision of the CHAIR should be the judgment of the committee; when

Mr. L. WILLIAMS withdrew his appeal.

The reading of the bill proceeded.

Mr. J. W. JONES moved an amendment, striking out $3 000 as the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, and inserting $2,500, to make it correspond with the amount recently fixed in the law regulating the same.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON asked whether, by retaining the $500, it would leave the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions the same as it was at the commencement of the session?

Mr. J. W. JONES replied that, by striking out $500, it would make the salary in conformity with the act of Congress at the present session.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON remarked that he was anxious to present an amendment, to make it what it originally was at the commencement of this session of Congress. The duties of that officer having been greatly increased, it was important to the Government that a man of talents should fill the place; and he should, therefore, vote against reducing his salary.

Mr. BRIGGS said he knew several gentlemen who supported the reduction with a view that the salaries of corresponding officers would be reduced at the same rate. He thought justice to that individual required that the former amount of salary should be paid to him. That was one of the most valuable officers of the Government, and what made it peculiarly hard was, that while his pay was diminished, his duties were considerably increased.

Mr. FILLMORE called the attention of the House to a rule restraining the insertion of any item not in conformity with law; and the law had fixed the salary at $2,500.

Mr. BRIGGS said the House could not, in virtue of the rule, increase the salary. He was, however, opposed to striking out the amount in the bill. He could see no propriety in singling out one of the best officers of the Government—a man whose head had grown gray in the service of the War Department, and who, a few months ago, was awfully smitten by Heaven, which calamity would render him a cripple for life, and who had since performed his duty under painful circumstances. He hoped the motion to strike out would not prevail.

Mr. J. W. JONES concurred in the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] that the Commissioner was a meritorious officer; but it would not be in the power of the House to place the salary at $3,000 at this time. If the salary had been found to be $2,500 at the time the appropriation bill was before the committee, they would have considered themselves bound to insert it in the bill. By the rules, the House could not now exceed that sum.

The CHAIR said that it was not in order to increase or diminish a salary fixed by law, by any provision in the appropriation bill; but the salary might be appropriated for more or less than a year.

Mr. J. W. JONES remarked that the bill provided for the salary for the present year, and presumed that the last year's salary had been paid.

Mr. W. THOMPSON hoped the case would be met by repealing so much of the act as fixed the salary of that officer at $2,500. He did not think that one so worthy should be made the only victim, and wished to offer an amendment; but the CHAIR ruled it out of order.

Mr. PETRIKIN said that not only an act of injustice had been done, but political trickery had been exhibited; but he was unwilling that the rules of the House should be violated for the sake of rectifying the evil.

Mr. HUBBARD had only a single remark to make in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who had once voted to reduce this salary, believing that he could go further with it: finding he cannot, he is not willing now to "make a victim of this officer." Mr. H. agreed with him that $2,500 dollars was a sufficient allowance; and if so, how could reducing his salary to a proper allowance make him a victim? He would not only adhere to his former vote, and go with the gentleman, but was sorry to find him faint so soon in the good work.

Mr. PROFFIT proposed to Mr. H. that if they would not call the previous question when the bill came into the House, he would move a reduction of each head of department $1,000, and the President's salary 25 per cent. and to add to the allowances of laborious officers on low salaries. He regretted that he had moved this reduction; but he had done so only as an entering wedge to a general reduction.

Mr. MONTGOMERY replied to Mr. PROFFIT, and reminded him that he could not be cut off by the previous question in the House, as by the new arrangement the question would have to be put on every amendment. He would, therefore, have an opportunity to carry out his reform and retrenchment, and he challenged him to make the attempt. There was no escape; and he held the gentleman to his ground.

Mr. POPE thought it cruel to wound the feelings of one officer by confining the reduction to his case—especially so excellent an officer as the Commissioner of Pensions. He believed the House generally regretted what had been done, and he did not doubt the act would be corrected before the session was over.

Mr. BLACK said, unless it was an extreme case, he was generally opposed to the reduction of the salaries of officers. The great majority of those who were employed in administering the several departments of this Government were but poorly paid, if their remuneration might be estimated by the usual emoluments of official skill and labor at the South. His constituents, he was persuaded, were more concerned to procure honest and efficient service, than to ascertain the very lowest salary upon which a man, who abandoned all other occupations, might live without actual starvation.

But, sir, (said Mr. B.) I cannot refrain from an expression of surprise at the very extraordinary course which this debate has taken. The Whig party on this floor, I speak of them as a party, have, upon almost every occasion during this session, loudly complained of the lavish and improvident expenditure by this Government of the people's money. They have, day after day, and in almost every debate, whether relevantly or not, charged this Administration with fraud and corruption in the disbursement of the Federal revenue. They were, it had seemed, the men, par excellence, of retrenchment, reduction, and reform; they have taken all that matter into their own hands, and accordingly the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] had himself originated a measure in this House by which the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions was reduced from $3,000 to $2,500. This was a Whig measure, originated and introduced by a prominent and able man of that party, and although voted for generally by both parties, succeeded mainly by the strength of the opposite vote.

So far, these gentlemen appeared to be acting, at least in this case, in strict conformity with their professions; and you may well imagine my surprise at the disposition manifested this morning to undo all they had accomplished in this instance of reduction. It seems that a Whig official is to be made the first victim of this retrenchment; and unwilling to supply a martyr from their own ranks, they are the first to turn on their heels, and refuse to make a practical illustration of their own peculiar system of reform.

Sir, how stands the case? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] acknowledges the paternity of the act of reduction. Before the passage of that act, the salary of the Commissioner of the Pension office was $3,000, and it had been so inserted in the appropriation bill now under consideration. The chairman of Ways and Means had moved, in accordance with that act, to strike out $3,000, and insert $2,500; and, to the astonishment of the House, certain gentlemen of the Opposition, with whom this very reduction originated, refuse to make the reduction, although required to do it by their own law. Mr. B. had understood that Colonel Edwards, the present Commissioner, was a Whig. If it be so, does that fact elicit the present extraordinary opposition of certain gentlemen to making this official the first practical example of retrenchment? And do they now contend for a virtual repeal of their own act, by refusing to insert its retrenching provision into this civil and diplomatic bill, because it will operate on one of their own friends?

But, independently of political considerations, how, asked Mr. B. can gentlemen consistently get round this law, which is of full force, lately passed, and is now among the statutes of the United States. That law, I understand, is imperative. If this House ever had any discretion in the matter, they exercised it when they passed the act of reduction; that having been done, they can no longer inquire into the expediency of reduction, but are bound to make the appropriation in accordance with the law, as it was written. If reform is the object, now is your time; and in order to convince the people of the United States of your sincerity and disinterestedness, you now have an opportunity of making a practical illustration of your own theory of reform, upon an officer, however worthy, of your own political complexion. Mr. B. whatever might be his opinion of salaries, would be compelled to vote for the motion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and to reduce the compensation, in obedience to the law, from $3,000 to $2,500.

After some debate between Mr. BRIGGS and Mr. BLACK,

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina spoke at some length in defence of his position, and the part he had taken in the transaction: and in the course of his remarks expressed his regret that the salary of the head of the most laborious bureau in the Government should have been reduced to relieve another office, which was almost sinecure. He disclaimed with warmth the charge of Mr. BLACK, observing that no man should cast such an imputation on him, and no man would do so who was possessed of any honorable feelings himself, and he asked the gentleman from Georgia to say explicitly whether he meant to impute to him (Mr. T.) "taking the back track" on this item in the bill, because the gentleman who filled the office of Commissioner was in his politics a Whig?

Mr. BLACK said he had been unfortunate that, in the very few words he had uttered, he should have run foul of a gentleman so sensitive. The gentleman from South Carolina knew enough of him to be satisfied that, if it was intention to insult him, he should do it openly; but if the gentleman thought to draw him from the investigation of the course of any member of that House by making it a personal matter, he was at all times subject to his call.

He had spoken of, and alluded to the political course of a party; he had made no personal attack upon any man; but, on the contrary, had directed every word he had said, as he ventured to believe every other man in the House understood him, to the political principles and policy of the party to which the gentleman from South Carolina belonged.

Mr. THOMPSON here attempted to resume the floor.

Mr. BLACK called on the House to permit him to proceed; he did not intend patiently to submit to be put down upon this occasion.

Mr. THOMPSON claimed the floor; when

Mr. BLACK said, if it was intended to cut him off from any other remarks, why, of course, he had nothing further to say.

Mr. W. THOMPSON asked the gentleman whether he imputed to him the motive to repeal the act, because he (Mr T.) was influenced by considerations that the Commissioner was a Whig?

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman expect to confine me to categorical answers? He would not submit to it here or elsewhere. He thought he had said enough to release the gentleman from any personal imputation.

Mr. THOMPSON said he had now asked the gentleman twice, and he still refused to answer.

Mr. BLACK said he had not refused to answer.

Mr. THOMPSON said, well, then, I give the gentleman an opportunity now of answering.

Mr. BLACK. Then take your seat, sir. When the gentleman does that, I will answer him.

Mr. THOMPSON accordingly took his seat.

Mr. BLACK then proceeded to remark, that if the gentleman thought of obtaining that by the force of a frown or a scowl which he was unable to obtain by argument from him, he was mistaken. In the remarks he had been making, he was alluding, as he had before said, to the political movements of a party, and was not to be deterred by any personal considerations whatever. What! had it come to this, that a member could not get up here to question the course of a party, without being required to make personal explanations? If that were submitted to, it would be a speedy and sure way of shutting up their mouths at once; of intimidating them into silence, and of preventing an exposition of party policy and political manœuvring. He would bring this personal explanation to a close by repeating what he had before said, that he had no intention of attacking any body personally, or to impugn their honor as men. He had attacked their political course. He had no other explanation to offer.

Mr. THOMPSON accepted the explanation, and, in the course of his remarks, said that whenever he should go out of his way to tell people that they could not browbeat him, he should think himself a fit subject to be browbeaten.

Mr. BLACK. Whenever the gentleman will say that I have boasted that I was not to be browbeaten, I will make a reply.

Mr. THOMPSON said he was willing to take the gentleman's explanation, as disclaiming any imputation on his motives, and as admitting that his conduct had been upright and proper.

Mr. BLACK. Upright, but not proper.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON inquired of the CHAIR whether it would be in order to offer a proposition that five hundred dollars of the amount at present appropriated in the bill should be paid to the Commissioner, in addition to the salary allowed, whenever the law should be altered to that effect.

The CHAIR having decided it to be in order,

Mr. JOHNSON sent to the CHAIR the following amendment:

That five hundred dollars of said amount be paid to the Commissioner of Pensions, in addition to his present salary of two thousand five hundred dollars, whenever increased by law.

Mr. GIDDINGS was opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and should vote against it.

Mr. HUNT said he was one of the few—as they now seem to be considered—unfortunate Whigs who had opposed this reduction when it was first proposed by his friend from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT,] and principally supported by his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] and he would support any measure that would restore the salary to its original amount. He was decidedly opposed to making this meritorious officer an individual exception to a general rule.

Mr. PROFFIT said that he had made the motion to reduce the salary of this officer without consultation with any one, and without fifteen minutes' reflection. So far from the party with which he acted being responsible for this motion, his political friends around him had found fault with him for making it, and told him they thought he had acted wrong; but he was actuated by his convictions of duty in offering it, and a majority of the House sanctioned it by their votes, and it was adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON then withdrew his proposition to amend.

Mr. HUNT then proceeded to address the House on the question of reducing the salary of the Commissioner, and having gradually diverged into the merits of the Independent Treasury bill,

Mr. SMITH of Maine said he rose to make one more effort to confine this debate within something like reasonable limits. He would respectfully inquire of the CHAIR whether it was in order for gentlemen, in a discussion on this bill, to investigate the merits of the Independent Treasury.

The CHAIR decided the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNT] to be out of order.

Mr. JENIFER said he would not only vote for a restoration of the five hundred dollars stricken from the salary of the Commissioner, but on account of the great increase of his duties, he would be willing to go even beyond that amount. Mr. J. then paid a high compliment to the industry and talents of the head of the Pension Office.

The vote was then taken on the motion of Mr. JONES to strike out $3,000, and insert $2,500, and tellers being demanded, the result was announced by the CHAR—ayes 93, noes 31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICE GARLAND moved to strike out the item of $11,600 for topographical and additional clerks in the General Post Office, and a clerk to keep the appropriate account.

Mr. G. objected to the introduction of such an item in the general appropriation bill. He thought if asked for at all, the appropriation ought to have been introduced in a separate bill. He contended that there was no law for governing the employment of additional clerks.

Mr. JONES referred him to the appropriation bill of 1834; and contended that the former practice of introducing the item for additional clerks into these bills, warranted the present committee in doing the same. Mr. J. then adverted to the valuable services performed by the additional clerks, and hoped the gentleman from Louisiana would see the propriety of withdrawing his motion.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. EVERETT, JONES, COOPER of Georgia, McKAY, and TRIPLETT. The latter gentleman having referred to "the member from Georgia" as belonging to the Whig party,

Mr. COOPER asked, Does the gentleman from Kentucky refer to me?

Mr. TRIPLETT. I do, sir.

Mr. COOPER. Then I beg the gentleman to withdraw his assertion that I belong to his party.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I withdraw it, sir.

The question on Mr. GARLAND's amendment was taken by tellers, who reported there was no quorum voting.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved a call of the House; upon which motion,

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 86, nays 33.

So the call was ordered.

The CLERK was then proceeding with the call, when

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that he had ascertained that several members had just come in, and he therefore moved that all further proceedings be dispensed with; upon which motion a division was called for, and the motion was agreed to—yeas 88, nays 39.

The House then again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CASEY in the chair.

And the question was again taken on striking out, and resulted—yeas 39, noes 85.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. R. GARLAND said the obstructions to the bill in committee might be easily avoided if there was an understanding that time would be given to debate it when it was brought into the House.

Mr. GRAVES said he had just been making the same suggestion to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to any bargains and compromises.

The reading of the bill was then proceeded with.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to strike out the clause in the words "for eleven additional clerks in the Post Office Department, thirteen thousand two hundred dollars."

Mr. JONES of Virginia explained, showing that the same appropriation had been made in many previous years, and the appropriation in the bill in the last year was a sanction to the Postmaster General, and the clerks were indispensably necessary to conduct the business of the office.

The question was then taken, and the motion disagreed to—ayes 38, nays 82.

Mr. GRAVES then moved to strike out the section in the words "for compensation to clerks in the office of the Surveyor General northwest of the Ohio, per act of May 9, 1836, six thousand three hundred dollars; which, after some remarks from Messrs. GRAVES, H. EVERETT, and R. GARLAND, in favor of the motion, and Messrs. JONES of Virginia, HUBBARD, HOWARD, and CRARY, against it, it was decided in the negative without a count.

Mr. GRAVES called for a division, and the CHAIR announced the vote—ayes 31, noes 78; no quorum voting, tellers were called for, and they announced the vote—ayes 39, nays 89; so the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GRAVES then moved to strike out the section in the words "for the office of the Surveyor General northwest of the Ohio four thousand five hundred dollars;" on which, after some remarks from Messrs. GRAVES, R. GARLAND, and EVANS, in favor, and Messrs. JONES and CRABB in opposition to the amendment, the vote was taken, and the CHAIR decided it was not agreed to.

Mr. GRAVES called for a division, and the CHAIR announced for the amendment 17, against it 82; no quorum having voted,

Tellers were demanded, and, being appointed, the vote was again taken, and resulted—ayes 33, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out the words "three hundred dollars," in the compensation of the Commissioner of Public Buildings; which,

After some remarks from Mr. STANLY in favor, and Messrs. JONES and LINCOLN in opposition, was withdrawn.

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out, in the compensation to the officers and clerks of the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina, the words "six thousand dollars," and insert "four thousand five hundred dollars"

After some remarks from Mr. STANLY in favor of, and Mr. CONNOR in opposition to the amendment,

Mr. OGLE offered, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out all appropriations for the various branch mints at Charlotte, Dahlonega, and New Orleans;

Which, after some remarks from Mr. OGLE in favor of the amendment, and Messrs. SHEPARD, LEWIS WILLIAMS, and GRAHAM in opposition, was disagreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the committee rise; which was agreed to; and

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the House adjourn; upon which question,

Mr. DUNCAN asked the ayes and noes, which were not ordered;

And the House adjourned at half-past six o'clock, p. m. on Tuesday evening.

After some remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD and WHITE, the question was taken, and resulted—yeas 17, nays 18.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, April 29, 1840.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS sent to the CHAIR, for the purpose of having it printed, a paper which he inteuded to offer as an amendment to the bill making appropriations to the Military Academy at West Point.

Mr. BURKE of New Hampshire, from the select committee appointed on the transactions of the CLERK with Mr. Langtree about supplying stationery for the House, moved that that committee be authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. GRAVES moved to amend the motion, by granting the same power to each of the six Committees on Expenditures in the Departments, and also to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. PETRIKIN said that every day those belonging to the committees, were seen in the lobbies. The motion now submitted was to have an army of clerks; and it came from those who were always complaining of the expenditures of the Government. These clerks were idle at least four days in the six. Is it (said Mr. P.) to be tolerated? If members of the committee did their duty, they could dispense with clerks. They did not want time or ability, but attention and punctuality; and why should those who are sent here by the people to do business, get other persons to do it for them? Mr. P. could cast his eye into the lobbies now, and recognise two clerks of committees present. The other day he saw three or four. He hoped the House would pause, before they acted with such gross inconsistency as to appoint the number of clerks asked for. Most of the committees had but two days' work in a week, and yet wanted clerks! Mr. P was one of the Committee for the District of Columbia during the last long session. They had the renewal of the charters of the District banks, and all the variety of business now before that committee to attend to. There was no necessity for a clerk then. All that they had to complain of was want of punctuality in the members. Mr. P. had been on several committees since, and had had the same cause for complaint, and hoped the House would not appoint an army of clerks.

Mr. GRAVES withdrew so much of his amendment as had reference to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and added that the clerks should be paid only for the time in which they were actually employed.

Mr. LEET remarked that he thought the Select Committee, whose chairman has reported this resolution, ought to be allowed a clerk; there would be a great propriety in it. If the subject referred to them received that extended and full investigation which he presumed it would, it must strike every gentleman that much writing will have to be done. The probability is, that a large number of witnesses will be examined, and, indeed, the inquiry may run back through several previous Congresses. He felt, however, no solicitude about it, and would be satisfied with any decision the House may make. He had a word to say in regard to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES] He thought it was unnecessary, as that motion proposed to provide for clerks for the several Committees of Accounts and Expenditures in the Departments, until they asked this House for them. If those committees, or any of them, deem it necessary to institute an inquiry, and find that the assistance of a clerk is needed to facilitate their labors, so far as he knew now, he would vote for it. But he was unwilling to anticipate the matter by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES,] and thereby furnishing clerks to these committees, without being called on to do so. He (Mr. L.) suggested that the honorable gentleman would withdraw his amendment, and not encumber the resolution of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BURKE.]

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS was in favor of allowing committees of investigation the assistance of a clerk, as in all such cases there was a very great amount of labor to perform, which could not be done in any reasonable time by the members of the committee themselves. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said he was willing to grant them a clerk when they should ask for one. But had not the chairman of the committee asked for one? Certainly he had, and urged the House to grant his request. It was a well known fact, that in these committees of investigation, their efforts were in some cases rendered nugatory, for want of the assistance of a clerk to assist them in the great amount of labor to be performed. He, therefore, hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania would no longer object to the employment of a clerk by the select committee, of which the gentleman from Louisiana was chairman. As to the other committees, he could not say much about them, except that when they were charged with any special investigation, required to be acted upon at once, it would be necessary for them to have a clerk.

Mr. COST JOHNSON was glad this motion had been made, asking the appointment of a clerk, and that an amendment had been offered, asking the allowance of clerks to other committees. He had always considered the assistance of a clerk necessary in many of the committees, when the amount of labor was necessarily so very great. He would, by consent of the House, move a still further amendment; which was, that the Committee for the District of Columbia, and the Select Committee on the subject of a National Foundry, be also permitted to employ a clerk. It was absolutely impossible for the members of those committees to go through the mass of business without one, and he would say, that if the House should refuse, a large portion of the papers must be reported without examination, or incur the expenses of printing, which would amount to more than the clerk; but if a clerk be allowed the committee, the expense of printing would be saved.

Mr. CRAIG opposed the motion, in a few remarks, which were not distinctly heard, and concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. BURKE now wished to withdraw his motion, but as he had made it by order of a committee, the CHAIR ruled that he had no power to do so.

Mr. CONNOR moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and were—yeas 100, nays 56. So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. LINCOLN asked the indulgence of the House to permit him, at this time, to present the memorial of William Wright, in reference to the manner in which the debt lately due to the United States from the Commonwealth Bank, in Boston, had been satisfied.

Leave having been granted, Mr. L. presented the memorial, and moved its reference to a select committee, upon which he expressed a desire not to be placed. The committee was thereupon ordered.

The CHAIR announced that the business first before the House was the report of the Select Committee on the case of Messrs. BYNUM and GARLAND.

Mr. J. W. JONES said the pressing character of the appropriation bill; the absolute necessity of its immediate passage, to supply the wants of the Government, made it his imperative duty to move the postponement of the consideration of the report until Friday next; which motion was agreed to, without a count.

Mr. RAMSEY asked and obtained leave to present a memorial of Mr. Sullivan, and have it referred to the Committee on Stationery.

Mr. CLIFFORD obtained leave to correct an erroneous statement in the report of the Globe, in which it was stated that he (Mr. C.) was included among a list of members who had been returned as in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and whose fine had been remitted. Mr. C. had been in attendance in his place the whole night, and had never been in custody, or discharged from it, with or without the payment of fees. He had no doubt the mistake had originated through inadvertence. The Reporter of the Globe had promised to have it corrected; but he thought it proper to make the statement to the House, that others might correct it, if they have been misled by the report mentioned.

Mr. HAND desired to make an explanation, which he thought was due to the honorable gentleman [Mr. SMITH] of Maine. It was reported in the last evening's Globe, that he stated that some gentlemen, after answering to their names, absented themselves. This remark, Mr. H. said, he believed, was not applicable to the gentleman from Maine, though it might be so understood from its juxtapos tion, by those who did not understand the subsequent proceedings.

Many members had been brought in. It was breakfast time, and several gentlemen supposing those who had come in would be sufficient to form a quorum, had taken that opportunity to obtain some. But so many left, that the House seemed in danger of an involuntary dissolution by the individual dispersion of the members, and the House was idle for want of a quorum. He moved a call. The SPEAKER said this was not in order, without first dispensing with the one not completed. He (Mr. H.) then explained, that he wished a supplemental call by order, as had been done before that night. That he wished the roll called over. The SPEAKER replied that, by naming absentees, a motion to take into custody would be in order. That knowing that a call of the absentees, or taking yeas and nays, would arrest the attention of members, and bring many to seats, and at the same time avoid meddling with the call in any manner, he then named three of his personal and political friends who had been active all night, and the gentleman from Maine being first named, the vote was first moved upon him and passed nem con; when his frend and colleague [Col. PRENTISS,] who was sitting by his side, immediately moved a reconsideration; upon which he, Mr. H. called the yeas and nays, avowing his purpose, which were ordered, and the motion carried, as he thought unanimously, until he saw by the papers there were a few negative votes.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. CASEY in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr W. C. JOHNSON moved to strike out the appropriation to carry on the branch mints at Dahlonega, in the State of Georgia.

Mr. J. W. JONES hoped the motion thus unceremoniously to do away this establishment would not prevail. This establishment had recently gone into operation; although its operations have been not very extensive, the coinage was a very considerable sum. Its operations would excel that of the parent mint during the same period when it was first established. A large amount of money had been expended in buildings and apparatus proper to conduct that important branch of national interest, and now it was unceremoniously and prematurely proposed to abolish it without even giving the establishment a fair opportunity to develope itself—and thus to desert this vast amount of public property to go to ruin, without any person even to take charge of the property, to save it from depredation. If this was the economy of the Opposition, he thought the nation could not be much benefited by it. He sincerely hoped gentlemen would consider the step they proposed to take; and trusted that this amendment, which goes to repeal an existing law, would not prevail.

Mr. COOPER expressed his surprise that the gentleman from Maryland should have proposed the abolishing of these institutions, when the results were already so satisfactory. The very same objections now urged, might, with equal propriety, have been urged at the time these mints were established; but now the money had been expended, and the mints been in operation two years, it was proposed to abolish them. He would remind the gentleman that there were many powerful reasons for the continuance of those mints in North Carolina and Georgia; and one of those reasons was, that they opened a market to the laborious gold diggers of those countries for their gold, without obliging them to submit to the extortion of speculators, who formerly shaved them at the rate of seven, eight, and ten per cent. in the product of their labor. Reason and common sense would dictate that the coining should be performed in the very heart of the country where the precious metals were found. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] yesterday had said that it was "an expensive business." He would ask that gentleman to tell him whether he had ever found that the business of coinage in the United States was not an expensive business?

Mr. C. then referred to the expenses attending the operations of the mint at Philadelphia, and asked why the same argument would not warrant the abolition of that institution?

Mr. C. then went on to show that if the whole amount of coinage were executed in the South, even at Dahlonega, it would be more economical than keeping up the Philadelphia mint. He said he would not detain the committee at that time, but on a proper occasion he would go into a detail of facts, showing that if the mere saving of dollars was the object in view, on a question between the mint at Philadelphia and the branch at Dahlonega, the decision would be in favor of the branch. He did not consider it, however, a mere question of dollars and cents. The Government had a policy to carry out, which had not yet been fairly tested.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland hoped when the chairman of Ways and Means rose for the purpose of opposing the amendment, that he would have given some other argument why this mint should not be discontinued than that the Government had expended a great deal of money to put it into operation. He expected to hear from him an argument based on the ground of great national interest—that, to subserve some great national end, it should not be discontinued; but his only argument was, that the Government had expended a great sum to put it in operation. If no practical good could result in the expenditure of $11,500 to keep it in operation, the fact of saving that amount ought to be a strong argument for striking it out. He knew that it was situated in the heart of a gold region, but he maintained that there was no saving to the Government on that account—the price of transportation of the bullion to Philadelphia being less than the cost to keep the establishment up. It was no saving on that score, but a drain on the Treasury of $11,500. The argument used last year, when the same question was agitated, was that it was an infant establishment; try it but another year, and if it did not prove advantageous to the nation, abolish it. He then went into an argument to show that the advantages then promised to the Government by keeping up the branch mints had not been realized, and that they should be established. The mint establishment at Philadelphia was adequate to all the wants of the Government.

Mr. HABERSHAM was understood to defend the mint as an object of great national policy. The establishment of this ment was in the country where he resided, and was in the heart of a great coal country. It had had a tendency to encourage in that vicinity a spirit of enterprise. The inducements held out had caused many not only to search for gold, but other valuable metals in which that country abounds. That region abounds in the richest minerals, gold, silver, copper, and iron. Notwithstanding it was there, it would be useless for the want of capital, and enterprise, if this mint was abolished. Such was the case to a certain extent, before the establishment of this mint there. But since its establishment there was no want of capital; it had diverted capital from other sections to invest in the mining operations there. The circumstance of its affording a ready market for bullion, and a fair equivalent for labor of this kind had given a new impulse to the mining operations; many persons are now engaged in it that heretofore would not touch it. Another advantage was that it prevents the gold and silver from being sold to the silversmith, to be melted up into wares, and prevented it from passing into foreign hands. It all finds its way now to the mint. The whole expenditure of the Government will be sunk, if the appropriation be withheld; the property of the Government would go to ruin. Mr. H. then went into the causes of the wastage; and also to shew the reasons why the operations of the mint had not been so great as might have been expected; he said that it took a long time to prepare the metal to give it a proper refinement, before it could be coined. Its operations hereafter for that cause would be greater.

Mr. STANLY obtained the floor, and made some remarks in relation to what he was understood to call a corrupt expenditure of the public money at the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina; from the tenor of which remarks, it was inferred that he was in favor of abolishing that mint for that cause. He exhibited an account of $218, incurred for the purchase of trees and shrubbery by the superintendent of that establishment, (Mr. Wheeler,) to ornament the public grounds attached to that establishment. He commented on the same, and denounced it, with the view, he said, of showing how beautifully these humbugs go together, and to show how this fellow (the superintendent) lived out of the public spoils. He made other remarks, the tenor of which may be inferred by the replies of his colleagues.

Mr. BLACK said he had risen without consultation with any party, either in that House or out of it, to set the mark of his decided disapprobation upon the very extraordinary account to which the gentleman from North Carolina had called the attention of the committee. I regret, sir, said Mr B. that such an account had ever been incurred or presented against the Government, and more especially he regretted that the Government had paid it. So far as the amount of money was concerned, it was a small matter; but the principle involved was the same, whether the expenditure was one dollar or one million of dollars. He was the blind advocate of no man or any set of men on earth; he acknowledged his adhesion to no party save that of the glorious and gallant State Rights men of the South, par excellence, the Nullifiers, for whom he claimed, in the face of the world, the high and honorable distinction of a pure, disinterested, and noble devotion to principle, independent of men; therefore, come from what quarter it may, he was ready and willing to go with the gentleman from North Carolina, or with any other man on that floor, in condemning and exposing any and every instance of political degeneracy.

Mr. B. said he wished to deal with facts. Let the Opposition cease to indulge, as they had too often done, in vague and general denunciation of fraud and corruption. It was pure declamation; let them come up to the mark with facts and specifications; this was what he had called on them to do all along; and whenever they did it, as in this instance, and produced conclusive proof of their charges of fraud, he held himself obligated to do every thing in his power to forward an investigation, and, when error was detected, to expose and condemn it.

He recognised no power in any Department of the Federal Government to contract such an account, nor had this House any constitutional authority to appropriate money to pay it. The superintendent of the branch mint at Charlotte, had clearly exceeded his official duties in purchasing these plants and flowers. The Government had departed from the strict line of its duty in passing the account, and we shall be clearly in violation of our duty if we appropriate money to pay for this North Carolina flower garden. But why is it that this fraud has not been previously investigated? Why was it permitted to slumber from 1838, the date of the account, until this particular period of time, when the claims of Georgia were legitimately before the House? Yesterday, the appropriation for the branch mint in North Carolina was under discussion, and was retained in the bill; during all that discussion, we heard nothing of these bulbous roots and tender exotics. Why were they not then introduced to the notice of the committee, instead of being thrust forward at this time, when the consequence may be to embarrass the claims of the branch mint at Dahlonega to the favorable consideration of this House? Although he was willing, at all times, to investigate any matter where there was even the least appearance of fraud, yet he besought the House not to entertain a prejudice against the mint establishment in Georgia on account of any supposed corruptions which may exist at the branch in North Carolina. He ventured to say that no such account would be presented from Dahlonega—the soil of his own State, emphatically the land of noble trees and beautiful flowers, could furnish, if it were competent for this Government to engage in such improvements, as rare and exquisite specimens of vegetable production as any other quarter of the globe; but even if it could not, he was not prepared to vote money out of the Treasury for the consummation of so questionable an object.

Having said thus much, said Mr. B. in order to avert any prejudice which may have been engendered against the mint at Dahlonega, by unnecessarily bringing into this discussion the supposed frauds at Charlotte, he would now proceed to speak to the merits of the question now before the House.

His friend from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] had moved to strike out this section of the bill, which provides the appropriation of —— thousand dollars for defraying the expenses of the branch mint at Dahlonega, in Georgia. This motion was based solely on the ground of economy, for he would not believe that the honorable gentleman from Maryland entertained any feeling of hostility towards the institution itself, or desired to withdraw the ordinary appropriations for carrying it on, except on the ground of expediency, and a saving to the Government. How, then, stands the question of economy in this case? This Government must coin money—there is a constitutional requisition on the subject—and, in accordance with that requisition, national mints, for the manufacture of coin, must necessarily be established, otherwise Congress could not, as required by the Constitution, "coin money." These establishments had been placed at Philadelphia, New Orleans, Dahlonega in Georgia, and at Charlotte in Mecklenburg county, North Carolina. If the question as to their location, was to come up de novo, where, think you, a disinterested man, who had no object to accomplish but the good of the people, would locate them? Why precisely in the heart of the gold or silver region, if such a region existed in the country at all; and if not, then nearest that port into which the greatest quantity of bullion, or of the precious metals in their crude state, were imported from foreign countries. In making such a location, all the risk and expense of transportation would be saved, and the original producer would not be saddled with the losses which must ensue from the multiplication of agents necessary to the successful operation of a mint situated at a great distance from the point of production. In such a case the natural order would be preserved; and instead of constantly transporting the material, at great expense, to the place of manufacture, you would make but one transportation of the machinery to the spot, where every thing would be found ready to your hand. If economy, then, was the object, why does not the gentleman propose to abolish the mint at Philadelphia? Does the soil of that city, or of Pennsylvania, or of any of the neighboring States, produce gold and silver in any quantity, or of any quality! Are there any surface or vein mines in the streets of the city of brotherly love? Do they abound, as does the whole region about Dahlonega, with the yellow ore of the South? No, sir, the veriest alchymist could turn nothing there into gold, not even if he had access to the vaults of the United States Bank—unless, indeed, the notable fiction of the transmutation of metals should turn out at last to be a solemn truth. If, then, sir, the city of Philadelphia be barren of gold, the next question is, can the port of that city compete with that of New York or Boston in the importation of the precious metals from abroad? I have no statistical data now before me, upon which I might base an estimate; but the received opinion is, that where Philadelphia imports one dollar of foreign gold, either of the other cities imports a hundred. And yet, sir, the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. OGLE] yesterday proposed to put a barrel of powder under the mint of Dahlonega, in the very heart of the gold region, and blow it up, upon the score, as he said, of economy. Why, sir, I doubt not the time will come, when labor and improved machinery shall have been successfully applied to the development of the illimitable resources of the Cherokee country in Georgia—when, instead of applying the torch to the branch mint at Dahlonega, the mother mint itself in Philadelphia will be blown sky high.

But it is said that the mint in Georgia is an expense the Government; if this be an objection to the mint in Georgia, it is equally true with respect to that in Philadelphia. Where, let me ask, was there ever an establishment for the coinage of money, that was not an expense, either to the Government or the individual who owned it.

A mint does not increase the quantity of gold; on the contrary, it must, of course, decrease it. The losses necessarily incidental to the process of coinage must, in the nature of things, decrease the quantity of metal originally supplied to the establishment; and therefore all this talk about loss and expense, is just as applicable, nay, much more so, to the Philadelphia mint, as to the establishment in Georgia.

Sir, said Mr. B there is another, and not less interesting view of this case. As a Representative from the State of Georgia, as a Southern man, deeply interested in the prosperity, not only of my own State, above all others, but of the whole South, I cannot but feel jealous of every movement here, the tendency of which will be to strike at our favorite theory of free trade, and by implication at our proposed system of direct importations. If the principles of free trade were brought to bear upon this subject, every thing would be left to its obvious position and natural course. But if the motion on your table prevails that position and that course will be violently interrupted, and instead of placing your mint in the midst of your gold, you remove it to a distance, and locate it in a remote region, when all the difficulties of transportation must be encountered before you can begin to compete with the more natural location. Sir, free trade is natural trade, and the natural position of an establishment which is to supply the medium of that trade, is precisely at that place where the commodity, to be used in manufacturing that medium, can be procured at the least possible expense.

Sir, said Mr. B. the South makes cotton, and the South makes gold—both of these articles are cash in the market of the world. The North produces neither of them, and yet she has managed, through our facile acquiescence in her monopoly of trade, to fertilize her barren and frozen hills, and enrich her energetic and enterprising population. And this she has accomplished by appropriating to her own benefit the intermediate use of these peculiar productions of our soil and labor.

Heretofore we have submitted to an unnecessary Northern agency in the disposition of our cotton, and if we follow in the same track, we will send our gold to Philadelphia to be struck into coin. Southern enterprise and ingenuity are not competent to conduct successfully a mint at Dahlonega, where the gold grows, but the precious metal, after it has been gathered by Southern labor, must be sent to a Northern city for coinage.

But, sir, said Mr. B. suppose the gentleman could succeed in his effort to abolish this branch mint at Dahlonega, what, let me ask him, would he have accomplished? Why he would take from the enterprising, industrious, and patriotic people of that section of Georgia, perhaps the most interesting part of the State, an institution which had greatly contributed to their prosperity. In that region there are numerous gold diggers and miners, whose labor supplies the mint. If that establishment be abolished they will be obliged either to export to foreign countries, or sell it at a loss from 8 to 10 per cent. in its crude state, to Northern speculators, or bank agents. Yes, sir, abolish the mint in that region, and you throw open the door to numerous extortioners and speculators, men who live not by the sweat of their brows, but who make their daily bread by their wits, ends, and appropriate to themselves, by their trickery and cunning, the hard earnings of other men's labor. Thus the people, who now have access to a mint where their week's labor may be converted into coin of a known and ascertained value, will be subjected to the tender mercies of men who will get from them, on the best terms they can, the precious metal in its crude state, and the loss of at least ten per cent. will fall upon the less intelligent but more honest laborer.

I am sure, sir, my friend from Maryland has not fully considered the consequences of his motion; if he had he would not have made it; for I am willing to believe that no man man breathes, more devoted than he is to Southern interest and institutions.

Mr. CONNOR replied to the remarks of Mr. STANLY, and spoke against the abolishment of the branch mint.

Mr. DAWSON opposed the amendment with much earnestness. He argued as a reason why the product of the mines in Georgia, and the amount of coinage which, to a certain extent, depended on the mining operations, were not so great as were anticipated, that labor was much higher in Georgia than any year previous. For the reason that the labor was more productive that year than at any previous years, the whole labor was converted from the mines to the growing of cotton. But this year labor being much cheaper and much depressed, it would drive the whole mass of labor to the mines, and the consequence, he said, would be, that the coinage at that establishment this year would be much greater than in the past year. Mr. D. then showed the comparative operations of the parent mint at Philadelphia for the first five years of its existence, and the branch mint at Dahlonega, Ga. for the first two years. The parent mint had, in the five years above mentioned, coined only an aggregate of $71,000; whilst the branch mint, situated in a forest, had, in the first year of its existence, coined forty per cent. more than the first five years of the parent mint; and in the second year (1839) had coined $123,870; and if it had silver, it would have coined four times that amount. He contended that the only counteracting power to prevent the coin from going to the commercial cities in the East and North, was to pertinaciously hold on to the mints.

One of the greatest reasons that this mint should be continued, was that it was situated in the heart of one of the richest mineral regions. Every variety of ore is to be found there in the greatest abundance; and in the course of a few years, in consequence of the new impulse given to enterprise by the erection of this mint, this country would become one of the richest portions of the world. Capital was flowing in from every section of the world; and scientific men were attracted there in great numbers. Thus would a development of the rich resources of the earth be produced, and would result not to the interest of Georgia alone, but to the wealth and greatness and interest of the whole nation. It was the usefulness of this mint he advocated; and did not go for it because it happened to be located in Georgia. He was not governed by sectional feelings, but by great national feelings. He testified to the economical administration of the mint at Dahlonega, and certified to the good character of the superintendent—he was an honest man. The amount of expenditures in that mint was small in comparison to other mints.

Mr. CONNOR here read a statement showing the expenditures at Charlotte and Dahlonega for three years, which proved them to be nearly equal.

Mr. HUBBARD rose to congratulate the country that the extravagance in our public officers was about to be lopped off by consent of both parties. There was no method but to reduce them to proper allowance—compel them to live carefully and economically. But, sir, whilst we are at this work, I request gentlemen of the opposite party not to look so sharp for the mote in the eye of the Democrats, but look more to remove the beam from their own. Let them cut off these extravagant appropriations of millions, for purposes that enrich one section of the Union, whilst they impoverish the other. I speak of gentlemen as a party—the gentleman from Georgia personally opposes all of them: as to this item of flowers, if the gentleman would go to the mother mint of Philadelphia, he would perhaps find it there to a greater extent; and perhaps he would find that it commenced before the election of General Jackson, and long before Mr. Van Buren was elected.

Mr. SHEPARD would not trouble the committee with an electioneering speech, but he would make a few suggestions to those who were so hostile to the branch mints. Since his attention had been called to this matter, yesterday afternoon, he had found, by a document on his table, the amount of gold and silver imported to this country at different periods of time. During the last year, 1839, the amount of bullion imported at the city of Philadelphia was $50 000. He had not been able to sum up the amounts imported into New York, Boston, and other Northern cities, but, on casting his eye over the tabular statement before him, it appeared that the greatest amount imported into this country had come to the city of New Orleans. Now, when gentlemen contended that we had more mints than were necessary, the real question would be, which of them ought to be abolished—those in the South, in the very heart of the gold country, and where the foreign bullion was imported, or the one at Philadelphia, where not a single grain of the precious metals was produced, and where but little was received from foreign countries? At the commencement of the Government, Philadelphia was the great emporium of commerce; here was established the Mint and the National Bank; a revolution had since taken place in the business of the country, and yet, by means of these national institutions, Philadelphia has continued to be the depot of coin, and to control the commercial affairs of the Union. Sir, it is time to destroy these sectional privileges; it is time to place every city and every State on an equal footing, and submit to the operation of these natural causes, which, if left alone, would produce the greatest amount of national wealth. If the question were new, the decision might be doubtful; but as the expenditure has been made, the house erected, and the machinery at work, why throw away this labor and expense? Why destroy establishments situated in the region where trade and nature have accumulated the precious metals, in order to favor a city, whither only artificial regulation would direct them.

Give these branch mints a fair trial. The member from Pennsylvania had stated that the coin struck at the three Southern mints had cost one-fourth, or a third, of the amount coined. This may be true, and this was probably the case with the mammoth at Philadelphia during the first year of its establishment. But this is not an argument. The honorable member is a lawyer, and probably his library, his horse and carriage, and other necessary outfits for a travelling attorney, were five times more than the amount of his briefs during the early years of practice; and would the member therefore say that the setting up law was a bad business? Would he not rather wait, and give his industry and abilities a fair and longer trial? During the last year $600,000 were coined at the three branch mints. The amount is gradually and surely increasing; and if gentlemen will be patient, and if Philadelphia receive from this Government no artificial advantages, by having the control of the paper system, or some other trick of the Federal head, I feel assured that in a few years the greatest amount of coin will proceed from the Southern mints. Sir my constituents are not immediately interested in this appropriation; they are very far from Charlotte; they will never have the least benefit from this expenditure; but as a North Carolinian I am opposed to the destruction of the mint until ample experience proves it to be expensive and useless. I would despise to advocate a proposition because a little advantage might accrue to the South; but, sir, when North Carolina and Georgia have the precious metals in the bosom of their soil, when trade brings to New Orleans a vast amount of foreign coin and bullion, why should our mints be destroyed, and the one at Philadelphia be sustained.

But a charge had been made against the superintendent of the mint in North Carolina, and it seemed that he had expended the sum of $218 in ornamenting the building with trees, &c. Now he would not say that he was in favor of such expenditures, but did we not act upon the same principle ourselves? Would not the same objection apply to the expenditure for trees, flowers, &c. for ornamenting the public walks and gardens of this Capitol. These trees did not belong to private individuals; they were the property of the public, and the poorest man in the community could enjoy the walks, and inhale the fragrance of the flowers, as well as he who expended a small portion of the public money on such improvements. As expenditures of this nature were for objects belonging to the people, and not for individuals, it placed the matter in an entirely new light. But yet he would admit that he could not encourage such expenditures; and if gentlemen thought that the superintendent of this mint had acted wrong, the Secretary of the Treasury might dock it from his salary.

The gentleman from Georgia said, that the new policy of the Government would drive all the coin of the country into the large cities. Sir, the policy of this Government cannot alter the laws of trade. Coin will go where it is wanted, or where people have something to pay for it; and their need be no fear on this subject, in the minds of those who are in favor of curtailing the paper system, and making the Government and people of this great country, independent of those whose business it is to manufacture currency. If the old policy should continue, there will not be much necessity for specie any where, either in town or country, the mean currency will drive away the good, and we shall again be flooded with issues of paper. But, sir, I have departed from the subject. I merely reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, and I take the opportunity saying that I do not suppose it possible to dispense with banks or paper money. My principle is to extend and strengthen the basis of specie, and to make banks subject to the laws of the land. These mints will probably have a good effect in supplying us with good currency, and it is another argument in their favor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD hoped this debate would now terminate; but he wished to make one suggestion, which was, that, in case the mints should be abolished, the salaries of the officers would still be authorized by law. Now, if they intended to legislate on these mints, they ought also, at the same time, to legislate on all the various interests connected with them. In reference to these mints, he would say that, if the question was now whether they should be created, he might perhaps oppose them; or if the question was in a proper form before them to repeal the law under which they had been created, he might be in favor of doing away with them all, except one great national mint. But that could not be effected in the manner proposed; and if the amendment should prevail, the loss to Government would be greater than the amount proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. McKAY hoped this debate would speedily be brought to a close; and, as he did not wish to add any thing to the delay, he would make but a few brief remarks, in addition to what had already been advanced, in defence of these branch mints.

The Constitution gave to Congress the exclusive power to coin money; therefore, it was the duty of Congress to provide the means by which this was to be effected.

For many years, there had been but one mint, located at Philadelphia; but, two years ago, Congress appropriated money for the erection of these additional ones. Now, every body knew that these mints in the South were in the midst of a country where the gold was procured; and Government was bound to afford every facility to the people of those parts of the country for converting the gold into coin. Therefore, it was nothing but right that these branch mints should be located in a gold country. So far as the operations of these mints were concerned, a very considerable amount of coinage had already been executed.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] had on yesterday objected to them, on the ground of expense. Why, upon the same principle they might contend for the abolition of all the district courts of the United States. They might contend that all these branch courts should be abolished, and one great court erected in their stead, to which the people would have to travel from all parts of the Union, in order to jet justice. This was a case precisely in point. The same principle would also apply to our navy yards throughout the country; and if there was any force in the argument that these mints should be abolished on the ground of expense, then all the navy yards except one should be abolished also; for it would be certainly much less expense to have one great navy yard, instead of several. But every reasonable person would admit that it was necessary for Government to study convenience, as well as expense.

In relation to the purchase of trees by the superintendent of the mint at North Carolina, it occurred to him that sums for a similar object had been expended by other officers of Government in adorning our public places. He believed many cases could be referred to, where an expenditure had been made for ornamenting our public buildings, by the planting of trees.

He hoped the motion to strike out the item for these mints would be withdrawn, and that they would be allowed a fair trial. Admitting that the expense should exceed the returns, yet that was no good reason for their discontinuance, as it was the duty of Government, in the exercise of its constitutional prerogative of coinage, to keep up those establishments at points most convenient for the people.

Mr. MONTGOMERY felt bound to make a few remarks in relation to these branch mints. He could not repress his surprise that whenever any appropriation came up for institutions in the South, there were found gentlemen on that floor who would invariably rise in opposition to it. It would appear from the remarks of some, that they were to have every thing in the North, and nothing in the South. He regretted, however, that this important appropriation bill should be delayed by a discussion of that nature, and as he was anxious to delay it as little as possible, he would make his remarks very brief.

His colleague had spoken in reference to an account paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. Wheeler, of the North Carolina mint. Now he would admit that it was a very extraordinary account, yet he did not know of any better person to examine into that account than his colleague. It would serve his colleague very well for electioneering purposes, and he was perfectly willing that he should have the full benefit of it. There was no doubt but that he would make some very handsome political capital out of those trees and flower gardens. He was surprised, however, at the account he had heard, as, until then, he had always understood Mr. Wheeler to be a very plain man. He would repeat that he knew nothing about this flower garden, but he was sure that if Mr. Wheeler fell into the hands of his colleague, he would get ample justice done him. If there was any man who could do justice in such matters, it was his colleague, as he believed that gentleman had spoken more of the extravagance of this Administration than any other gentleman upon that floor.

But there was one favor which he had to ask of his colleague. It was this: he hoped that when he published this extraordinary account of the flower garden, he would also publish, and attach to the account the fact that he [Mr. STANLY] himself had voted for the money which paid for it.

This Administration was charged with all the extravagant expenditures. Now he would beg to say, that during the Twenty-fifth Congress, at least, the Administration were less guilty than the Opposition. He could prove that fact, as he had done before, by a reference to the journal; yes, during that Congress, the Whigs, with the aid of the Conservatives, had a majority here, and it was a notorious fact, that the greatest Government appropriations that were ever made were made during the period, when the Opposition themselves had the majority, and could, with their majority, have controlled them. He knew very well that few of those gentlemen were willing to admit the fact, but it could be found from an indisputable authority, the journal of the House, which shows that over seventy-five millions were appropriated during that Congress, and that the Whigs and Opposition members have fewer votes recorded against this unprecedented amount than the Administration members: see the journal where the votes are recorded.

Mr. M. was here called to order by several gentlemen for irrelevancy. After some dispute on that point, he said as he did not desire to wound the feelings of those sensitive gentlemen, or to make them unhappy by a reference to their votes at this time, he would say no more on that matter. He would repeat, however, that if every institution of the South was to be put down on the ground of expense, the South had very little to expect.

He did not blame the Northern members so much, as perhaps such opposition might be expected from them by their constituents, far removed from the place of expenditure, and formed a part of their duty. But he was surprised to hear of opposition from Southern men. He regretted that such a proposition had been supported by any gentleman from the South. They had natural resources in the South, and when they were attempting to bring them into operation this opposition arose from gentlemen whose interest it was to support rather than oppose them, and it could only arise from political party feelings. It was more aimed at men than at measures, and could be made here to manufacture political capital: for the vote taken upon the motion to abolish, showed that they did not calculate on success. Let men have all they can make out of it. They required a sound constitutional currency, a circulating medium, in accordance with the requisition of the Constitution. But what did gentlemen say here? Why, that they should not have the means of carrying it into effect.

In his district they had one bank, which had about a half million of specie locked up, so that the people could not touch a dollar, nor did they know how to get it; for the banks refused to pay any body, and made every body pay them. Would men—yes, sir, men of family submit to such tyranny without a struggle? Yes, these bank men bought up the specie with their depreciated bank paper, and then blamed the Administration for it. They first drained the people of their hard money, and then turned round and cursed the Administration for the effects of their own diabolical paper system. It was a notorious fact, that in one single day that bank bought up a half million of dollars in specie, and put afloat their worthless paper in its stead. They were told by the bank men that they should have nothing but a paper currency. But if those paper tyrants thought they could oppress the people of the South, they would find themselves mistaken. The people of the South were yet free, and he thanked God that oppression was only known, as yet, in the Eastern States. It might suit the bank men very well to compel the people of the East to take their worthless paper, but that would not do in the South.

Instead of being tyrannized over by these banks, he was in favor of these branch mints, from which we could get a constitutional currency, instead of worthless paper; and he would tell them that the day was not very far distant when no portion of the people would submit to the oppression any longer. They would not long submit to have their bullion taken and locked up in the banks.

He would not say that his colleague was a bank man, although it so happened that all the friends of the gentleman were engaged with the banks. Now there was one singular fact to which he wished to call the attention of the committee and the country. It was, that these very men who were now opposing the branch mints, to stop the coinage of good money, did, on a former occasion, vote against a proposition to compel the banks to keep in their vaults one dollar for every three dollars of paper. Yes, he would go further, and say that these men voted against a proposition for compelling the banks to keep one dollar of specie for every five dollars in liabilities. He had the proof of all the facts before him, page and vote marked; but as he did not wish to delay the passage of the bill, he would not trespass further on the time of the committee, in relation to that matter; but would, should his remarks be published, give the vote upon that subject. He would content himself by saying that he was prepared to prove all he had asserted, and a great deal more besides, upon these modern Bank Federal Whigs. He had the material all ready, and would use it the first opportunity that offered.

If these branch mints were put down, it would be doing great injustice to the people of the South, and playing into the hands of the Bank Federal party there, who hate gold and silver—who surreptitiously obtain it, and then lock it up, and refuse to pay the honest poor man for a five dollar bill of their own money, which he has labored hard for, but compel him to go to one of their agents and have it shaved for good money, and that, too, with their own money, and then curse Van Buren and his party for their own foul acts. Did Mr. Van Buren compel them to shut their vaults and act dishonestly towards the people? No; he had no such power, and they knew the fact.

Mr. CUSHING, in allusion to some remarks by the gentleman from North Carolina, denied, so far as he was concerned, than the people of the North were opposed to appropriations for institutions in the South, merely because they were for the South. For his part, he was now willing to vote for any appropriation in which the interests of the Union could be promoted, let the appropriation be for North or South. Such were his feelings, and he was not aware that any other feelings existed among the people whom he had the honor to partly represent. He would not agree that it was considered by Northern members as their duty to oppose appropriations for the South. He desired that the public works might be diffused throughout the United States, as they benefited not merely the spot where they were located, but the whole Union.

In relation to the motion to strike out the item for the expenses of these branch mints, it appeared to him a very different question to the question as to whether these institutions should or should not be continued in existence. The latter question depended on the law establishing the mints, but so long as that law was in force, it was evidently our duty to make the necessary appropriation for carrying them on. The question of abolishing them was an entirely independent question; therefore, so long as the law was in force, he should be disposed to vote for the appropriation to defray the current expenditures. Then the question as to whether they ought or ought not to be continued, would furnish matter for an after consideration.

In relation to the alleged abuses referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina, it reminded him of the strong position taken by his colleague [Mr. ADAMS] the other day. That gentleman had said, if the Committee on Public Expenditures would investigate all such cases of alleged fraud, and have their report ready at the time the appropriation bills were brought up, some millions of the public money might be saved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland said he wished to submit an amendment to suspend the salaries as a modification of his first proposition; and inquired of the CHAIR whether it would be in order.

The CHAIR said it would be in order to make an appropriation subject to a certain contingency.

Mr. JOHNSON then offered the following as a modification of his original motion to strike out, viz:

"And that the said salaries shall cease at the expiration of the current year; and that at the expiration of said period, the establishments in Georgia, North Carolina, and Louisiana, shall be suspended until otherwise directed by law."

Mr. CUSHING said that, under the existing laws, the President, Secretary, and other officers, are entitled to certain salaries. The law that creates those officers continues them at those fixed salaries. Therefore if you strike out the appropriation in this bill, it did not repeal the law allowing the salary. These officers will be still entitled. By refusing to appropriate would not affect their right to it; but the Government would be still indebted to them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland said the power which created the law could destroy it, either in a separate bill, or as a section in another bill. The precise time or manner was unimportant With that view he proposed the amendment.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment was out of order. This was a bill making appropriation for the current expenses of the Government, to provide that for which the existing laws called.

Mr. JOHNSON said he differed with the CHAIR, yet he did not wish to take an appeal. He was not responsible for the debate which had taken place on the amendment. He made the motion without a word of comment, and took his seat: the friends of the Administration were responsible. In relation to the astonishment expressed, that a Southern man should have made a motion to reduce an institution located in a Southern State, could not influence his action. The doctrine of Southern interest was no doctrine to operate or influence him: it was useless to rise with such arguments to influence him. The same arguments and reasons that would induce him to vote for a measure in Georgia, would govern his actions for like measures in North Carolina. He believed it was a useless expenditure of money; and he was astonished that it was defended on no other ground than that it was located in the State of Georgia. All these appeals had no influence. Though he was a Southern man, he would only go with the South when it was in favor of the prosperity of the whole Union. He was always opposed to prodigal expenditure of money, without regard to the particular section of country it was proposed to benefit. If such an argument should obtain, it would be a most potential argument to bring about what these Southern gentlemen so much deprecate, a protective tariff. He then went into an argument to show that the destruction of the mint would not operate to the injury of the gold-finders, or the laborers engaged in the mines in the district of country in which it was located, even if it did drive them to the necessity of disposing of the result of their labors to the speculators, of which the gentleman had complained. The whole operation of the branch mints was a drain on the Treasury, and resulted to individual, instead of national advantage. He was willing to show his regard to the interests of the South, by voting for something that was useful to the South. These mints were not. He was opposed to the creation of these institutions in the first place. When the whole facts of the case should be known to the public, he did not believe any Administration could be sustained that would support them. Mr. J. concluded by withdrawing his modification, and let the original amendment stand.

Mr. DROMGOOLE dissented from this indirect mode of repealing a law of the land. Why did not those gentlemen who were opposed to these institutions come forward in the early part of the session—after a discussion of this subject for two years—and propose a bill to repeal, in a proper manner, the law authorizing these institutions, if they were deemed unnecessary?

Mr. OGLE said he had, in the early part of the session, introduced a resolution calling upon the Department for information, with a view of bringing forward a bill, but the House had voted it down.

Mr. D. resumed, and said, that was the regular mode of doing the business; and it was evidently a test of the sense of the House, of its determination not to repeal the law: and now it was proposed to do that indirectly which the House refused to do directly. He did not deny that it was within the power of Congress to withhold an appropriation. He would ask gentlemen whether it would be right in Congress to withhold from members of Congress the amount of pay to which they were entitled under an existing law of the land. If it were withheld, he had no doubt that they would soon go home. He would ask those gentlemen who made so much clamor about economy, whether this measure now proposed was bona fide economy. What, he asked, would become of the public property? Do gentlemen suppose that, if the salaries of the officers be withheld, they will not act as we would act, and abandon their stations?

If this appropriation be withheld, it would be tantamount to the abandonment of property that cost the Government half a million of money; leave it to go to destruction, to save a few thousands. This would be, indeed, a beautiful system of economy. We had the right to refuse to appropriate to fulfil existing laws; but he would ask gentlemen, did not this amendment repeal the law, which the House refused directly to do? He put it to gentlemen, whether it formed a proper precedent in legislation, whether it was proper to do that indirectly which the House refused to do directly, and thus delay an appropriation bill, and do manifest injustice to those who were in the employ of the Government, and who were now suffering. Who would ever think of looking into an appropriation bill to ascertain the duties of the officers of the mints, or to ascertain whether the law, establishing the mints, was repealed? Congress could not, with justice, withhold the appropriation.

Mr. STANLY made some further remarks here.

Mr. JONES was sorry to trouble the committee with any further remarks on this subject, nor would he have done it, but for certain statements introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] which had been taken hold of by other gentlemen, and converted into a charge against the Administration.

It might be considered by the committee that it was his duty, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to have examined this matter; but it would be obvious to all, that these charges referred to transactions more than two years ago. Notwithstanding, had he been aware that the charges would be made, he should certainly have turned his attention to the matter.

The gentlemrn from North Carolina had selected these charges from a vast number of items. He had brought them from isolated items of an account not before the committee, and which referred to transactions two years ago. Now every one knew, when a gentleman selected his own items, and placed them in the hands of an ingenious man, how very easy it was to make

"The worse, appear the better cause."

When a gentlemen had the power of selecting a few isolated facts without giving the connection by, which they perhaps might be explained, it was very easy to give a coloring which might be removed by an examination of all the facts. His mind had been brought to that conclusion by the recent law passed in relation to certain alleged abuses in the Departments. The other day he had heard a charge made that a large number of newspapers had been purchased in the Post Office Department, and the money of the Government expended for the purpose of encouraging a party press. Owing to the charge, he conceived it his duty to address a letter to the Postmaster General on the subject, and what was the answer? Why, that, although the amount appeared on the face of the account, yet one half of it had been paid for debts contracted by the former incumbent of the Department. Thus it would be seen at once how very dangerous it was to rely on these ex parte statements. It would be seen how very easy it was to create a wrong impression by examining only one side of a question. Before such charges were made, they ought always to be investigated, so that both sides of a question might be examined, after which a very different impression might exist. How was it in our courts of justice when a juror was sometimes so convinced of the guilt of a party as to require no further evidence? But in how many cases, after hearing the defence, was the opinion of that juror completely changed, and all prejudice removed by counter and explanatory evidence?

If abuses existed, and the history of all Governments proved that they would exist under the most virtuous Administrations, he was perfectly willing for an investigation, so that they might be corrected. What had the Administration done at the present session? Had they not thrown open the door as wide as it could be thrown for the purpose of investigation? Then if there were any alleged abuses, let gentlemen investigate them. Yes; let them have a full, fair, and thorough investigation, and if, after that, it should be found that corruption existed in any quarter whatever, he and the party with whom he acted would go heart and soul for reform. But he would entreat of gentlemen not to bring charges here without previous investigation. Let not the parties be condemned without a hearing. He had no doubt but the abuses did exist, and, considering the imperfection of human nature, it would be a great wonder if they did not exist.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] in speaking of the purchase of trees at the mint in that State, had presented an extraordinary array of names. The gentleman had brought up many hard words, which he said he could scarcely spell, nor pronounce them after he had spelt them. They were, in fact, what in Virginia they termed "jaw crackers."

Now he would tell the gentleman that many of those fine, high sounding names were but the classical names of trees common to every part of the country. For instance, among the rest, the gentleman had discovered the "horse chestnut," and had made a great flourish about that as one of the rare trees paid for out of the Government money. But would the gentleman permit him to tell him that these horse chestnuts were plenty in our country, and that in the West it was what they called the buck-eye. Mr. J. then told an amusing anecdote of some Western genius who sent all the way to New York and procured at great expense a certain bush, with a high-sounding latin name. But when it arrived, the poor fellow discovered there were plenty of the same kind on his own ground.

Mr. J. again protested against the practice of bringing charges on the floor against individuals, who had no opportunity of defending themselves. He hoped this practice of general denunciation, without proper examination would be discontinued. In relation to the purchase of trees, by the superintendant of the mint in North Carolina, if it were a fault, it was a fault into which many others, much higher than that individual, had fallen. The trees belonged to the establishment, and if they were purchased by the peoples money, they were the property of the people, and not that of individuals.

After some further remarks from Mr. STANLY, the question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the bill was ameuded by the addition of $7,000 to pay the expenses of an extra session in the Territory of Iowa, preparatory to coming into the Union.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa effered the following amendment:

"To supply the deficiency in the appropriation for the year 1839, for defraying the expenses of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, $14,000."

Mr. C. said he did not intend to make a speech for home consumption, but with a view that the committee might understand the grounds upon which the people of Iowa claimed the appropriation asked for. He then read a clause in the act of June, 1838, for organizing the Territory of Iowa, which appropriated a certain sum to defray the expenses of the Legislative Assembly, incidental expenses, &c.

Mr. C. said that the printing of the laws had not been paid for, and was one of the items for which an appropriation was now asked. Mr. C. inquired if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the House, were willing for him to go home, and answer to the printer, and to those who had vacated their church that the members of the Assembly might there hold their deliberations, that he could not get an appropriation to pay for the printing of the laws, the expenses of the Legislative Assembly, and the rent of the church?

Mr. C. invited the attention of the committee to a statement, showing the amount of money paid into the Treasury since the organization of Iowa Territory, and said that last year a larger amount was appropriated for the Wiskonsin Assembly than for that of Iowa; and if there was necessity for any difference, it ought to have been in favor of Iowa, its members having to travel a greater distance to the seat of Government.

He then sent the resolutions of the General Assembly to the CLERK'S table to be read, to show the necessity which existed for the additional appropriation of $14,000.

Mr. C. asked why Wiskonsin received $34,000 and Iowa but $27,000. He wanted to know why Iowa was turned off with a less sum?

Mr. C. then stated the amount appropriated for Wiskonsin and Florida for several years past, and did not complain of the appropriations—they were not too large—but he wanted to know the reason for the difference between the appropriation for those Territories, and that of Iowa.

Mr. C. by way of information, sent to the CLERK'S table, to be read, a statement from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, showing how far Iowa had contributed to the support of the Government in the sales of public lands; and Mr. C. in the course of his remarks, argued generally in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. PETRIKIN said that the appropriation was to pay debts owing to mechanics. The printer of the laws of the Territory had executed his duty, and for want of pay was now bankrupt. If the House did not furnish the people of Iowa means of knowing what the law was, they were not to be blamed for any infraction of them. Mr. P. contended that the appropriation should be made.

After some remarks between Messrs. J. W. JONES, BOND, LEADBETTER, and CHAPMAN of Iowa,

Mr. PETRIKIN offered the following as a substitute for Mr. CHAPMAN'S amendment, which Mr. C. accepted.

"For the payment of the printing of the laws, and other contingent expenses of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, being a deficiency in the appropriation made for the year 1839, fourteen thousand dollars: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the payment of members of the said Legislative Assembly for per diem wages, or mileage, or extra services, or for the payment of any of the members thereof, or of its its clerks, or for stationery for their individual use."

A few words passed between Messrs J. W. JONES and CUSHING; after which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. STANLY here made some remarks in relation to the salary of the Attorney General, and read some portion of the report of the Swartwout investigating committee. He was replied to by Messrs. J. W. JONES and PETRIKIN.

Mr. CRABB moved to strike out the appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of law books for the office of the Attorney General: and it was disagreed to—ayes 51, noes not counted.

The clause for "compensation to the district attorneys and marshals, including those in the several Territories, $14,550," having been read,

Mr. W. B. CALHOUN moved the following amendment to that paragraph:

"And that the said district attorneys, marshals, and also the clerks of the circuit and district courts, shall keep an account of all fees, forfeitures, salary, and perquisites, received or charged by them, and render the same annually, under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury; and all sums of money received by either of said officers, whether from fees, forfeitures, salary, or perquisites, if in the southern district of New York, the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the district of Charleston, South Carolina, the district of Louisiana, including New Orleans, the district of Massachusetts, over and above the sum of $3,500, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, meaning to limit the whole compensation of the officers above named, to the sum of $3,500, in each district; and in all other districts, whether in States or Territories, not named as above, the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks, shall render an account as above required; and all sums of money received by each of said officers respectively referred, to over and above the sum of $2,500, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, intending hereby to limit the amount of compensation of said officers to the sum of $2,500."

Mr. J. JONES rose to a question of order. The proposition was in a separate bill, which covered the whole subject; and by the rule it would not be in order to introduce into this bill.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order; and

After a few remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN and MASON on the point of order,

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, the gentleman who introduced the bill to which the reference was made, stated that that bill was different in its provisions from the amendment.

The CHAIR then decided the amendment in order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. Then I appeal.

The CHAIR understands, since his first decision, that the provisions of the bill were entirely different from the amendment proposed now. Under the statement of the gentleman who reported the bill to which reference was made, that the proposition was different, the CHAIR has no hesitation to state that the amendment is in order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he did not take an appeal from any captious motive, or to throw any obstacle in the way of the amendment, or action on the bill. He should not care if it was this isolated question, but it would be a precedent dangerous to our legislation. We should have the duties of officers interpolated in an appropriation bill. The proposition is entirely different in its nature from the bill now before the committee. This is a bill making appropriation for the compensation of officers, under existing laws; and the amendment proposed is to prescribe the duties of officers, which belongs to the bill creating the officers, and not the bill to pay them. There was no instance on record where, in a bill to pay the officers, a proposition was incorporated to prescribe the duties of the officers. He was opposed to it on two grounds. The bill of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] was substantially the same: it was something in relation to the appointment of marshals and attorneys. This amendment is of the same nature. It belongs in point of substance and character to that bill, and not to this. The whole object of the amendment was to embarrass the bill with extraneous matters. If this course of legislation be permitted, it would involve confusion in the laws. Whoever would think of looking in the civil and diplomatic bill for the duties of the marshals and attorneys. It would produce such a confusion in the legislation of the country, which every wise legislator would wish to avoid.

A debate here followed, in which Messrs. EVANS, DAVIS, of Kentucky, BRIGGS, GRAVES, and L. WILLIAMS participated, in favor of the decision of the CHAIR, and Mr. MCKAY in opposition, who cited a decision in point, in support of the ground he assumed; when

Mr. GRAVES obtained the floor, and was discussing matters irrelevant to the question before committee; when

Mr. PETRIKIN called him to order for irrelevancy of debate.

The CHAIR decided that he was out of order.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to his proceeding without permission of the House.

Mr. BLACK moved that he be permitted to proceed.

The question was taken by tellers; and it was ascertained that there were—ayes 65, noes 44: no quorum having voted.

The committee rose, and its chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. MCKAY moved a call of the House.

Mr. PROFFIT moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Virginia demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 54, nays 76.

So the House refused to adjourn.

There being a quorum now present,

Mr. MCKAY withdrew his motion for a call of the House.

The House then resolved into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic bill.

The question being on the motion to permit the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] to proceed in his remarks, Messrs. CRABB and POPE having been appointed tellers to ascertain that fact, reported ayes 68, noes 45—no quorum voting.

The committee again rose, and its chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. EVANS thought it impossible to get through with the bill that night, and moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 64, nays 78.

So the House again refused to adjourn.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, and the question being on permitting the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] to proceed in his remarks, the question was taken by tellers, (Messrs. CARTER and HOPKINS acting as such,) who reported ayes 107, noes 25.

After a few remarks by Messrs. GRAVES and MCKAY,

The CHAIR stated the ground on which the appeal had been taken from the its decision, that the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts was in order; and upon putting the question whether the decision of the CHAIR should stand as the judgment of the committee,

Mr. R. GARLAND called for tellers; when Messrs. CLIFFORD and CARTER were appointed tellers, who, after a count, reported—ayes 51, noes 74.

So the decision of the CHAIR was reversed.

Mr. GIDDINGS offered the following as an amendment to the same; but it was declared to be out of order:

"Provided, That in those States where jurors are drawn by constables or other officers of corporate towns or places, the marshal shall receive for his trouble in distributing the venire for each grand or petit jury the sum of two dollars, and no more."

Mr. R. GARLAND then submitted the following as an amendment:

"Provided, That no salaries or fees shall be paid to any district attorneys who shall not have paid into the Treasury any money collected by him."

Mr. MCKAY suggested that there was already a law to the effect of the resolution just offered; which law was read by the CLERK.

And after a debate, in which Messrs. R. GARLAND, PROFFIT, PETRIKIN, STANLY, EVANS, HOLLEMAN, J. W. JONES, MCKAY, GRAVES, CHAPMAN, and GALBRAITH participated,

Mr. PROFFIT moved that the committee rise.

Tellers were called for, and Messrs. CARTER and PETRIKIN were appointed tellers; who reported—yeas 52, nays 70.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and resulted—yeas 34, nays 60; no quorum voting.

Tellers were then called for; when Messrs. GRAVES and LEWIS were appointed, and, after a count, reported—yeas 33, noes 84: still no quorum.

The committee then rose, and the Chairman reported to the House that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. DUNCAN moved a call of the House.

Mr. STANLY moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DUNCAN called for the yeas and nays; which having been ordered,

Mr. STANLY withdrew his motion.

Mr. EVANS renewed it.

Mr. CLIFFORD called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were, yeas 64, nays 72.

A quorum being present,

Mr. DUNCAN withdrew his motion for a call of the House.

Mr. CRABB asked leave of absence until six o'clock to-morrow; which leave was granted.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, and

The CHAIR stated the question to be on the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Tellers were called for, and Messrs. PARRIS of Maine and DAVIES of Pennsylvania, were appointed, who reported—ayes 47, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

The following paragraph in the bill was then read, viz:

"For defraying the expense of the supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; also for jurors and witnesses, in aid of the funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred in the year 1840, and preceding years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits, in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecuting for offences committed against the United States, and for the safe keeping of prisoners."

Mr. J. W. JONES moved to fill the blank with $300,000, the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, based on the statements of marshals. The appropriation of last year was but $128,000, in consequence of there being an unexpended balance on hand, of former appropriations, of upwards of $200,000. That was the cause of the discrepancy.

Mr. CUSHING inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether he had any estimates in detail which made up this large aggregate.

Mr. J. W. JONES said he had no detailed estimates. The Secretary of the Treasury had informed him that the details furnished him amounted to upwards of $340,000, but that the Secretary deemed the $300,000 in the bill sufficient.

Mr. CUSHING said that a portion of this amount goes to prosecute the State prisoners, and for the safe keeping of prisoners, of which McKenzie and Van Rensselaer were among the number. They should be no longer imprisoned. He had received petitions on the subject, which he had no opportunity afforded him to present to the House; and if he had had an opportunity to present, it would not have been in his power to discuss. It being in order now, and probably the only time during the session, he would embrace the opportunity to make some remarks on the subject. The petition he held in his hand, he said, would reach to the chair; and it was an illustration of the great interest felt in the country in relation to the imprisonment of these gentlemen.

Mr. PARRIS said it was not in order to discuss the subject of this petition, whether these gentlemen were justly or unjustly imprisoned.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Massachusetts was in order.

Mr. CUSHING said it was in order for him to show that a portion of this amount should not be appropriated to rivet the chains on these gentlemen any longer. Their imprisonment ought not to be continued. Mr. C. was again proceeding to discuss the merits of the imprisonment, when

Mr. TURNEY said, if the CHAIR decided the gentleman in order, he would take an appeal.

Mr. CUSHING made a few remarks on the appeal, to show that he was in order; when

The question was taken by tellers (Messrs. WORTHINGTON and DAWSON acting as such,) whether the decision of the CHAIR should stand as the judgment of the Committee, and resulted—ayes 41, noes 68: no quorum voting.

The committee rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. GALBRAITH moved that when the House adjourn, it should adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow, which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. EVANS then moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. MILLER demanded the yeas and nays, which not having been ordered,

The House, at 11 o'clock, p. m. adjourned.

IN SENATE,

Mr. W. said that at this late period of the session no action could be had on the subjects embraced in this petition, and he would therefore ask that it might be laid on the table, informing the Senate, however, that before the close of the session he would take occasion to offer some remarks on these and other subjects connected therewith.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to pardon and direct the release of William Lyon Mackenzie, imprisoned in the jail at Rochester, New York, for a violation of the laws to preserve the neutral obligations of the United States; and also to direct the remission of any fine which may have been imposed upon him for the same offence.

TAPPAN, HUBBARD, BENTON, CLAY of Alabama, SMITH of Indiana, WHITE, CALHOUN, and YOUNG participated, was recommitted to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company, was taken up, and, after some remarks from Messrs. KING and WHITE, was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee of Claims, reported back to the House Senate bill No. 1, entitled an "Act for the relief of William H. Robertson, Samuel H. Garrow, and J. W. Simonton;" which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. R. also made a report on the case of Charles S. Matthews, Charles Wood, and James Hall.

Mr. R. also made an adverse report on the case of Lorenzo N. Clarke, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHAPMAN, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back to the House, Senate bill, No 91, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Colin Bishop," without amendment; which bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REYNOLDS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to reserve one township of land from the sale for an asylum for the deaf and dumb in the Territory of Iowa; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. ELY, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of John Reynolds and Mary Reynolds; also, from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of Thomas Richards; which petitions were laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER of Kentucky, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of Thomas W. Chinn, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. M. A. COOPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Thomas Wade; which was read, and laid on the table.

Mr. H. also made a report on the petition of Nancy Perry, late widow of John Davis, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

The committees having been called through, the House proceeded, during the residue of the morning hour, to dispose in order of the business on the SPEAKER's table.

The first subject was a motion to print 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the expenditures and defalcations since the year 1789; which was agreed to.

The next was the motion of Mr. FILLMORE to print 5,000 extra copies of the report of contingent expenses of the State Department; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. R. GARLAND hoped the vote would be reconsidered. The printing of the report would only cover the tables of members with documents, which, he undertook to say, not ten members would read.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee moved a reconsideration.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped some additional copies of all the reports from the several Departments, showing the expenses of the contingent fund, might be distributed among the people. The House had been in the habit of suppressing information, by only printing enough for themselves.

Mr. R. GARLAND said the printing would cost considerable, and there was no necessity for it. But if the committee thought it necessary, he would not oppose it. Mr. G. moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of State.

Mr. PETRIKIN wanted no one-sided reports, but all the facts. They had already had evidence of garbled statements.

Mr. CARR presumed that every gentleman was prepared to vote upon the subject; and, therefore, called for the previous question.

Mr. FILLMORE called for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon reconsidering the vote by which the report was ordered to be printed; which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. R. GARLAND then moved to refer the motion to print to the Committee on Expenditures of the State Department.

And the question being taken, no quorum voted.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to lay the motion for reference on the table; which was agreed to.

So the subject was laid on the table.

The motion of Mr C. JOHNSON to print 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of payments made at the Treasury from 1834 to 1839, then coming up for consideration,

Mr. ADAMS said he saw no reason why the document should be printed after the other report had been laid upon the table. He did not know on what grounds the motion was originally made in the discussion, at the time it was presented. He thought, however, that it ought to be treated like the one just decided on.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER of Kentucky, the motion was laid on the table.

On leave given, Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, without amendment, a Senate bill in relation to the iron steamboat New Jersey, formerly called the Robert L. Stockton.

On motion of Mr. C. the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. GRAHAM asked leave to offer a resolution, providing that the House will, after Monday next, meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected to it.

Mr. GRAHAM moved a suspension of the rule, and called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, resulted—yeas 91, nays 85: not two-thirds.

So the rules were not suspended.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY of Illinois in the chair,) on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840.

The item under consideration last evening was the following:

"For defraying the expenses of the Supreme, Circuit, and District Courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; also, for jurors and witnesses, in aid of the funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred in the year 1840 and the preceding year; and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecutions for offences committed against the United States, and for the safe keeping of prisoners, $300,000."

Mr. CUSHING was addressing the committee, and was called to order.

The CHAIR had decided that Mr. C. was in order; from which decision an appeal had been taken, and the question being put, no quorum voted; the committee rose, and the House adjourned. And the question now pending was, 'Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the committee?'

After some desultory discussion, the question, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the committee?" was taken, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 113, noes 15.

So the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

Mr. CUSHING then proceeded to address the committee, and said that he proposed to discuss the question whether it was proper to appropriate money (and if so, how much) for the safe keeping of certain prisoners of State, who were held in prison in the State of New York; and if that was not in order, he would propose an amendment to make it so

[Cries of "Offer your amendment."]

Mr. C. then offered the following amendment: "Five thousand dollars thereof to be applied to the more commodious safe-keeping of the two prisoners of State, held in prison in the State of New York for alleged violation of the neutrality act, so called."

[The persons alluded to are Messrs. Mackenzie and Van Rensselaer.]

Mr. C. then proceeded to state reasons why additional consideration should be shown to these individuals, as being victims of State policy for State reasons.

Mr. CRAIG called Mr. C. to order: first for irrelevancy; but subsequently changed the ground, so as to make his point of order against the amendment itself, on the ground that it proposed to change the existing laws as to the mode of keeping State prisoners.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be order.

Mr. CRAIG appealed from that decision

The appeal was debated by Messrs. BRIGGS, MASON, DROMGOOLE, CRABB, TILLINGHAST, and CLIFFORD.

The question was then taken, and the vote stood—ayes 28, noes 98.

So the decision of the CHAIR was reversed.

Mr. CUSHING demanded from Mr. JONES the estimates on which this item was founded. Since the discretion of the Executive might not be controlled, and he must vote manacled hand and foot, he wanted at least to know how much of this sum went to provide for the incarceration of those victims of Executive policy.

Mr. JONES explained, and laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department referring to the estimates from the marshals. The details had all to be audited before the money could be paid, but it was impossible to foreknow them now.

Mr. CUSHING said then he must submit to a policy which, for acts rewarded in England by knighthood, the Executive gave imprisonment in a jail.

Mr. EVANS moved the following amendment: "For the second and third volumes of the Documentary History of the American Revolution, agreeably to the act of Congress approved March 2, 1833, and the contract made in pursuance thereof with the Secretary of State on the 19th March, 1833, for ty-five thousand dollars."

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, as this work was printed under contract, and had been delivered, it must be paid for.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked whether the work conformed to the contract?

Mr. EVANS said the Secretary of State was the judge of this, under the contract, and he was satisfied, and had reported accordingly.

The amendment was then agreed to.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana, moved to strike out the appropriation of $100,000 for coast surveys, and insert the following:

"Be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and they are hereby appropriated for the continuation of the Cumberland Road, viz: For the State of Ohio $75,000, Indiana, $100,000, Illinois $100,000. These sums to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, subject to all the restrictions and regulations of former appropriations."

Mr. PETRIKIN said the amendment was out of order, as it was not in pursuance of any law.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be in order.

From this decision Mr. TURNEY took an appeal.

Mr. DAVIS asked what law there was for this appropriation for coast surveys?

Mr. JONES explained. The coast survey had been commenced under a statute which he cited.

Mr. UNDERWOOD opposed the amendment as out of order, and insisted on this point of order, on the ground that the rule made a distinction between amendments and clauses reported by a committee.

Mr. STUART, of Illinois, supported the amendment, contending that the Cumberland Road had been commenced under a law as much as the coast survey. They stood on the same ground. And it rested, besides, on contract, in which it had the advantage.

Mr. R. GARLAND replied to Mr. UNDERWOOD, and quoted the rule to show that it made no such distinction as Mr. U. had supposed; the amendment was as much in order as the clause proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he was satisfied.

The question being taken on the appeal, tellers were demanded and ordered; and the vote was, ayes 54, noes 42.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, MAY 12, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 24.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. —WEEKLY— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

No quorum having voted, the committee rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House, when

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House, and the question being put, the ayes were 50, the noes 48.

The roll was thereupon called, when 138 members answered to their names. The absentees were then called, when 140 members were found to be present; and

On motion of Mr. BANKS, a quorum being now present, all further proceedings with the call was dispensed with.

The House then resolved itself into committee and resumed the consideration of the bill.

The vote was taken on the appeal, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 68, noes 44. But, no quorum having voted, the question was put again, by consent, and resulted as follows—ayes 86, noes 42.

So the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

Mr. DAVIS briefly advocated his amendment. It was his purpose to move to strike out certain other items from the bill, amounting in all to $360,000, while his amendment was only $230,000. He wished to keep within the limits of gentlemen who were fastidious in not exceeding the estimates from the Departments. He should not enter into details, but felt bound to notice some of the remarks which had been made when the subject was before up. It was true that the President had omitted to insert it in the estimates for this bill. It was a gross omission. Though a party man, he did not approve of this part of the course of the Administration, but he was not one of those plastic politicians whose only merit was their pliability. The President, however, had sent in estimates for the road from the Secretary of War; yet no bill had been reported for it to the House; of this he complained. Gentlemen refused to vote for this appropriation because Martin Van Buren had not recommended it. Was Martin Van Buren the oracle of the House? He would that gentleman considered him so in some other cases.

Mr. BROWN of Mississippi apprehended that such a course would lead to reply and elicit a long debate.

Mr. DAVIS then rallied to Mr. PARRIS, who accused the people of the West of being squatters and pillagers of the soil, and went into a eulogy on the said squatters and pillagers, of whom many came from Maine, who were known by their fondness for pine logs and saw mills; but all of them improved the soil by labor.

He then went into the question of the constitutionality of the road. He referred to the sanction of all our Presidents in its favor, and also to the masterly speech of Mr. MASON, of Ohio, on the constitutional question. He then went into the estimates for the completion of the road, and insisted that they were altogether erroneous and extravagant. The West would take, gladly, one-half of the sum, and engage to finish the work. He argued to show that it would be a saving to appropriate now, lest the road should go into a state of complete dilapidation, and require four times as much hereafter. He noticed the accusation against the President, that he had sacrificed the West to get the South; if so, it was miserable policy, for he would, by such a course, lose the West, and not thereby gain the South.

Mr. HUBBARD made a point of order. The appropriation had nothing to do with the President's opinions, but must be judged on its own merits.

Mr. DAVIS was glad to hear this. He hoped gentlemen would act on that principle, and vote this appropriation, whether the President had recommended it or not. He replied to some previous remarks of Mr. HOFFMAN as to the course of the Whigs in relation to this road.

Mr. HUBBARD again protested against going into general politics.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina held it in order, on an appropriation bill, to go into the whole course of the Government.

Mr. DAVIS insisted on his right to reply to an accusation in some sense personal to himself. He then went into an explanation of a local kind, as to his course in Indiana, when canvassing for the last election; in the course of which, he noticed some remarks of Mr. PROFFIT, touching "tricks and capers cut" in that State during the election. He noticed the constitutional objections of certain gentlemen from Virginia against the road, as geographical in their limits, and suddenly seizing those gentlemen when the road reached a certain point. He dwelt on the pledge and contract of the Government, which bound them to its completion: on the memorials from Western Legislatures; and the justice, necessity, and good policy of pursuing and continuing the road. Mr. D. went into the objections urged by Mr. PICKENS, deriding the idea of danger to the Union from the continuance of a work so purely national. Mr. D. was quoting two speeches of Mr. CLAY, when

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi called him to order.

Mr. STANLY objected, and said let him go on, his speech would have to be answered; and

Mr. PROFFIT gave notice that this part of Mr. DAVIS's speech would certainly be answered, be the consequences what they might.

Mr. D. resumed, and dwelt on the justice of the claims of the Western people to the completion of this work; and adverted to a certain "handwriting on the wall of the market place," which indicated that all opposition to them would be futile. As long as he had the honor of holding a seat here, he should be found toiling to sustain their rights, and resisting the tyranny of the General Government toward the people and interests of the West.

After some remarks from Messrs. W. THOMPSON and UNDERWOOD,

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON addressed the committee in support of an amendment offered by him to the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, in favor of completing so much of the road as remained unfinished between Rockville and the Monocacy river, and appropriating $80,000 to that object.

Mr. DAVIS being asked to accept this amendment as a modification of that proposed by him, at first consented, but, on hearing an objection from Mr. PETRIKIN to the amendment, declined.

Mr. JOHNSON went on to advocate the amendment he had offered with great earnestness, showing its great importance to the regularity of the mails; insisting that the United States had failed of fulfilling its contract to Maryland, in neglecting this part of the road, and commending the enterprise of his State, in expending so largely on her roads and canals.

He replied to Mr. DAVIS's complaint about the oppressive conduct of the General Government to the Western States, pledging himself to aid in a bill repealing the act which exempts the public lands from State taxation for five years. To make up for the expense of the amendment he had proposed, he should, when in time, move to reduce the amount appropriated in this bill for the survey of the public lands.

Mr J. expressed his hearty concurrence in the plan proposed by Mr. UNDERWOOD for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands; should that prevail, he was ready to vote that Maryland should take her portion of this road, and complete it from her own resources.

Mr. BRIGGS was against the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, but in favor of that moved by Mr. DAVIS, as a part of that great system, which, though broken in upon, had not been broken down, and he hoped never would.

Mr. DAVIS now explained that he did not wish to strike out the appropriation for the coast survey.

Mr. BRIGGS said he would vote for the appropriation for the road, as a part of the great system in which Government had been engaged for the last eight years. Mr. B. was proceeding to remark on the relative number of Whig and Democratic vote given on the rejection of the bill at a former session; when

Mr. PETRIKIN called him to order, on the ground of irrelevancy.

The CHAIR decided that Mr. BRIGGS was in order.

Mr. PETRIKIN appealed from that decision, and tellers being ordered, the ayes were 68, and the noes 48: no quorum.

The committee then rose, and the fact was reported to the House.

Mr. McKAY moved a call of the House.

On that motion Mr. CHAPMAN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 98, nays 56.

So the call was ordered.

Mr. FILLMORE said as there was now a quorum, he would move that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

This motion was agreed to.

The House again resolved itself into committee on the bill; and

The question then recurring on the appeal,

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew it.

Mr. BRIGGS then resumed his remarks, and was proceeding to speak of his vote on a former occasion, when he was called to order by Mr. SMITH of Maine, who contended that the gentleman had no right to speak of his vote at a former session.

The CHAIR decided that Mr. BRIGGS was in order, inasmuch as he was replying to charges made in committee by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS.]

Mr. BRIGGS resumed, and further insisted on his former position, and protested against Massachusetts being included in the general charge of having destroyed the appropriation. Mr. B. had always voted for the road, and should continue to do so, on general and unchangeable principles.

Mr. FILLMORE appealed to all friends of internal improvements not to press the question now. If that subject was brought up, he should be compelled to introduce amendments to the bill for harbors and rivers. The speeches were interesting; but this was not the time to press amendments of this kind. There was no hope of such measures succeeding till the aspect of the Administration was changed.

Mr. REYNOLDS rose to reply.

Loud cries of order echoed through every part of the Hall.

The CHAIR called to order.

Mr. R. then proceeded, and replied with some warmth in repelling the charge of having misrepresented the facts in this matter, insisting that the Whig speeches had operated to defeat the appropriation; and that it would be found, by reference to the journal, that its death blow had been given by the Whigs.

Mr. BRIGGS explained. The gentleman had appealed to the journals to prove the Whigs had defeated the measure by their votes, when the journals proved the contrary.

Mr. REYNOLDS continued, and in his reply elicited much merriment from the committee, insisting that the Whig speeches defeated the measure.

Mr. BRIGGS made a brief rejoinder, again referring to the journal, and the 63 Administration votes in the House which defeated the bill.

Mr. EVERETT desired to state the reasons why he had voted for the Cumberland road, and also why he had voted against it. Sir, (said Mr. E.) when I first came here, I was a friend of the system of internal improvement, and voted for this road for four or five sessions. I then considered it, and now consider it, a national object. But, sir, when I found that the system was broken down—when the Constitution was limited to tide water; when, sir, I found the system completely prostrated, so far as the country at large was interested, I voted against this road. I have done so for years. Since the system was prostrated, the States have taken the subject into their own hands; and in the situation they were now placed, and after having expended large sums, he had no hope that a majority could hereafter be found in favor of the system. He considered that the system of internal improvement had been, years since, effectually prostrated; and he had no expectation that it would ever be resuscitated under any future Administration.

The question was now put on Mr. W. C. JOHNSON's amendment to the amendment, (for the road between Rockville and the Monocacy,) and decided in the negative.

The question was then put on Mr. DAVIS's amendment and decided in the negative—ayes, 51, noes 92.

Mr. RICE GARLAND moved to strike out the item providing "for the salaries of registers and receivers of land offices, where there are no sales, $3,500."

He contended that there was no law for allowing this salary of $500 per annum each for doing nothing, besides a commission of one per cent. on all the sales.

Mr. DOWNING said that he had been appointed as one of these officers, and would tell the gentleman that this appropriation was required only in cases in which the proceeds from the public lands were not sufficient to enable the officer to deduct his salary.

Mr. JONES proved that, in former appropriation bils, it had been the invariable practice to insert this item. Mr. J. then caused a communication from the register on the subject to be read by the Clerk, which fully explained the conditions on which the appropriation was required. He also referred to the laws which authorized the appropriation for the annual salary of these officers. After explaining this matter, and meeting the objection of Mr. GARLAND, by a reference to the laws, Mr. J. with some warmth, expressed his astonishment at the course pursued by some gentlemen in delaying the passage of the bill. After adverting to the many officers of Government, who were thus unjustly kept out of their money, he expressed his fear that it was even now too late to save the country from disgrace. He had been apprised that there were already several Government drafts, which had been presented, and which could not be paid until after the passage of this bill. Thus the credit and honor of this Government were entirely at the mercy of a few individuals who held these drafts. This was a most appalling state of things, as our credit was in danger of being destroyed, not only at home, but the world over.

He implored gentlemen to reflect on the disgrace they were bringing upon the country by their opposition to this bill. If it was desired by any one that humiliation and disgrace should be brought upon the country, he was sorry; but for himself, he should rejoice, if, by any effort of his, he could be the means of arresting dishonor and this heavy visitation from his country. So far as he was concerned, he was willing to sit here day and night, if it were possible to remove the threatened evils.

After some further debate of a desultory character,

Mr. GRAVES wished to know why the Secretary of the Treasury had not transferred certain sums from the Missouri Bank at St. Louis, to enable him to meet these calls.

Mr. JONES explained, that after the various calls on the bank by Government drafts should have been made, and which would be made shortly, but a very small sum would remain. Besides, he would tell the gentleman, that in case the Secretary or any other officer should undertake to pay money for which there was no appropriation by law, there was no member in the House who would be more ready to condemn him than the gentleman from Kentucky himself. Yes, he would venture to say, that if the Secretary had done what the gentleman now blamed him for not doing, in that case the gentleman would have been the first to rise in his place and denounce him. He, Mr. J. was not complaining that they had no money, but that there was no legislation to authorize the expenditure of it. Fortunately for justice and the honor of the country, there was money, but they wanted law to to authorize the use of that money.

After some additional remarks from Mr. GRAVES in support of the motion to strike out,

Mr. TRIPLETT followed on the same side, and wished to know if there was not a Senate bill then in the House, proposing to amalgamate all these officers into one, or to abolish them. If so, why was this item brought forward?

Mr. JONES said it was true there was a Senate bill in Committee of the Whole, for the object stated; and if the bill should pass, these officers would not be paid. But in case that bill should not pass, then it would be necessary to have the money. It was with that view the appropriation had been included in the bill.

Mr. SMITH had been exceedingly amused at the discussion upon this item of the bill. He had witnessed, with more than ordinary satisfaction, the prompt and ready manner in which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had met and triumphantly overthrown every objection to the appropriation under consideration. The case was in a nutshell. The law required the establishment of the offices. The President had no discretion in that matter. The same law peremptorily required the appointment of the officers, and prescribed their salaries. It was made the duty of the President to appoint them. Now what was the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky? Why, that the President ought to remove the officers, because it appeared there was no duty for them to perform, in order to save the amount of their salaries. Was it to be believed, that the gentleman from Kentucky was serious in this argument? Would he claim for the Executive the power to abolish an office established by law? Mr. S. had heard that gentleman and his friend complain vociferously against the right of the Executive to remove incumbents of office and appoint successors. For the exercise of this power the President had been branded as a tyrant and a despot. And now the gentleman complains, unblushingly, that the President does remove officers, who act under public laws, because he thinks their services are not needed! This was a greater stride of Executive power than he had expected the gentleman from Kentucky, so long before the ascendency of the log cabin candidate, to take.

The gentleman from Louisiana had started, as an objection to this appropriation, that there was no law authorizing it. The chairman of the committee, with his usual urbanity, had pointed out the law, and the gentleman from Louisiana had glided, with great ingenuity, from that objection, and taken the ground that the House ought to withhold appropriations in all cases where it appeared that the officer had nothing to do. Mr. S. could hardly believe that the gentleman would be willing to put in practice, in his own case, such a principle. Officers with salaries fixed by law, were entitled to them, whether they had duties to perform or not. The fault was in the law, and not in the officer or the power by which he was appointed. Would the gentleman from Louisiana, who had recently received the appointment of judge of the highest judicial tribunal of Louisiana, be willing to relinquish his salary of five thousand dollars, if the good people of his State should choose to eschew litigation, and leave him without a case to decide? It might turn out that the gentleman, in his high judicial station, would have little or nothing to do; and, upon the principle he had advocated, the Legislature of Louisiana ought to abolish his salary. Was the gentleman prepared to sustain this doctrine?

But the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. TRIPLETT,] after being driven from point to point by the chairman of the committee, came at last to the conclusion, that it was the duty of the President to close all the land offices where there was little or nothing to do. This was the most monstrous stretch of Executive power ever before contended for in this country. The people of Kentucky would stare when they heard that such an argument had been made by one of their Representatives upon this floor. Mr. S. asked the gentleman from Kentucky to point out any law authorizing it under which the President could do this, close an office, created and established by law! As well might the President order the custom-house at Philadelphia or New York to be shut up.

Mr. S. thought that the gentleman from Louisiana and his associates, who had opposed this bill were deserving of much credit for the manner in which they had managed to escape, when cornered by the consummate ability of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He had been reminded by it of the sports of his youth. He had often, when a boy, been in the habit of mingling in gymnastic sports; and he had often seen his young associates, when thrown flat upon their backs in a fair scuffle, twist and turn all possible ways to turn his antagonist; generally with ill success. The struggles of the gentleman were under very similar circumstance, and they were as little successful against the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JENIFER, after some preliminary remarks in relation to the delay of the bill, gave notice that he would move to amend the item for contingent expenses abroad of foreign missions, by adding $12,000 for the appointment of diplomatic agents to attend to the tobacco interest. Mr. J. said, if in order, he would offer the amendment at that time. After some debate of a conversational character, the amendment was ruled out of order.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. GARLAND to strike out the item providing for the salaries of registers and receivers of land offices, and it was negatived.

Mr. J. W. JONES moved to amend the bill: to come in after the 404th line the words following: "for marking and fixing the boundary line between the United States and Texas the sum of $10,000.

Mr. R. GARLAND did not object to the amendment, but he would like to have some information on that subject, as to what progress had been made by the commissioners. It was a matter of great interest to the people of his State; he represented the district immediately bordering on the line. A considerable amount had been expended for this purpose, and he wanted to know how it had been expended.

Mr. JONES replied that the amount appropriated at the last session, to enable the individuals who were appointed to attend to this matter, had not been entirely expended, but had been so far expended, that before the next session, an additional amount would be required.

Mr. J. then alluded to the unexpected difficulties which the officers had to encounter, owing to the condition of the country through which it was necessary they should pass.

Mr. GARLAND wished to be informed whether the salary of the officers had been paid ever since their appointment.

Mr. JONES said he had not thought it necessary to inquire into the matter, as to whether the salaries had been paid or not. He had contented himself with the belief that the money would be properly applied by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. J. subsequently alluded to the law, and informed Mr. GARLAND that the salary of the Commissioner was not authorized to be paid until he was ready to commence service, and the salaries of the subordinates not until they had been actually in service. His information was, that the Commissioner had not received pay until he was ready for service, nor had the subordinates until they were actually engaged in service.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. JONES then offered another amendment providing for the salary of a commissiner, surveyor, and clerk, $5,700; which was agreed to.

Mr. STANLY then moved to strike out the item of "twelve dollars and twenty cents," being a balance due to the commissioner appointed to superintend the erection of buildings and machinery of the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina.

Mr. JONES explained that this small item was for the payment of labor performed, and he was surprised that his friend from North Carolina, who professed to to be the advocate of working men, should object to it.

Mr. STANLY then withdrew his motion.

Mr. JONES offered an amendment, appropriating $10,000 for the payment of a balance due for the construction of the branch mint at Dahlonega.

Mr. R. GARLAND made some objection to the amendment.

Mr. JONES explained the circumstances under which the balance in question was inserted in the bill, and expressed his astonishment that the gentleman from Louisiana, who generally paid such close attention to the business of the House, had not been better informed as to the fact, as set forth a short time before, when the subject had been up specifically.

After some further remarks from Messrs. STANLY, R. GARLAND, JONES, L. WILLIAMS, DAWSON, MASON of Ohio, COOPER of Georgia, and OGLE, the question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes 100, noes 21.

The paragraph "appropriating $51,000 for continuing the construction of the new Treasury building" having been read,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend it by striking out $51,000 and inserting $105,000 to finish the colonnade, portico and out offices. Mr. P. said this was exactly the amount called for by the estimates of the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Mr. JONES said the $51,000 was inserted in exact conformity with the estimates furnished the Committee of Ways and Means. It was believed by the Secretary that it would put the building in a condition to make it comfortable to the occupants; and it was deemed by that officer prudent, considering the present exhausted condition of the Treasury, not to ask for more than was required to render the building comfortable. The ornamental work it was not deemed prudent to progress with at this time.

Mr. PETRIKIN said the chairman was was not properly informed on the subject. There was $53,000 already expended. The amount in the bill did not cover the amount due the hands for the work already done; and, therefore, that amount cannot make it comfortable, as the gentleman says.

Mr. LINCOLN said he had no predilections for this building. He did all he could at the last sessions to prevent its being built in its present location. He was willing that its walls should remain as a monument of the folly of those who had authorized the location and manner of construction; but he felt himself constrained to show the amount of money expended, and the manner of the expenditure. He then went into a history of the whole matter, and censured the course of the Secretary in reference to it. He defended the appropriation under the circumstances as absolutely necessary; for if it be withheld, the consequence would be a great loss to the Government; and it would it be doing crying injustice to the mechanics, to whom more was due than was proposed to be appropriated. It would be improper to discharge them, considering the nature of the circumstances under which they were brought here. He concluded by offering the following as a modification of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, viz: Strike out the $51,000, and insert in lieu thereof, "including the arrearages due for materials furnished, and labor performed on the said building, certified by the Commissioner of Public Buildings to amount, on the 15th of April, 1840, to the sum of $53,194 06, the sum of $105,000."

After a few remarks from Mr. LINCOLN, in support of the above amendment, Mr. PETRIKIN accepted it as a modification of that offered by himself.

Mr. JONES said the gentleman from Massachusetts seemed to put the matter on the ground that these men had a right to enforce their claim, and left it to be inferred that the President of the United States had made a contract with them. If the gentleman intended to be so understood, he did not think he was acting with his customary liberality towards the President and heads of Departments. The committee would however see how the matter stood, by a reference to the facts. Mr. J. then explained, that when in October last the money appropriated was expended, the laborers requested permission to go on solely on their own risk as to when Congress should make further appropriation. He also stated that at the time these estimates were sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, he doubted whether more than $5,000 was due. So that at the time the estimates were presented, there were sufficient to cover the whole expense incurred, and leave a considerable sum for going on with the building. But it would be obvious to all, that there had been no contract nor obligation on the part of the President, but that the laborers had merely received permission to go on at their own risk.

After some remarks by Mr. PETRIKIN in favor of the amendment; and by Messrs. PROFFIT and STANLY, the latter gentleman, before concluding his remarks, yielded the floor to

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama, on whose motion the committee rose, and the SPEAKER having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported progress on the bill, and asked leave to sit again; which was granted; when,

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, the House, at eleven o'clock, p. m.

Adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, May 1, 1840.

Mr. WRIGHT presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York, granting to the Federal Government the right of constructing a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that the punishment of W. L. Mackenzie may be mitigated; which was ordered to be transmitted to the President of the United States.

Mr. N. also presented the petition of the heirs of Daniel Pettibone; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the memorial of the Mount Carbon Coal Company; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of the General Assembly of Missouri, praying that certain lands in that State may be brought into market, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Capt. John De Treville; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been recommitted the bill to authorize the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad Company to enter, on a credit, a quantity of land to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes, reported the same back to the Senate, with amendments.

Mr. Y. said he was instructed by the committee to ask the Senate that the bill might be taken up, and the amendments considered, at the present time.

Mr. PIERCE said that his colleague, [Mr. HUBBARD,] who was necessarily absent from his seat, had taken a prominent part in the discussion of this bill yesterday, and for this reason he hoped the Senators interested in it would consent to postpone its consideration until his colleague should be in his seat.

This course being objected to, a debate ensued, in which Messrs. LUMPKIN, SMITH of Indiana, BENTON, CLAY of Alabama, YOUNG, TAPPAN, KING, CALHOUN, and WEBSTER, participated; when, on motion by Mr. W. the bill, and all similar bills on the calendar, were postponed until next Tuesday week.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The bill for the relief of James McCrory;
The bill for the relief of the heirs of Frederick Seigle;
The bill for the relief of the heirs of Dr. John Ramsey;
The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Jordan, deceased, late a captain in the continental line of artillery artificers; which were made the special order, being taken up,

Mr. PIERCE addressed the Senate at great length in opposition to the bills.

After some remarks by Messrs. PRESTON and STURGEON, the bills were informally passed over.

And the Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, May 1, 1840.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House at once go into Committee of the Whole on the general appropriation bill.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the Committee on Privilege, in the case of Messrs. BYNUM and GARLAND, was postponed till Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, viz:

1. Letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report of payments made from the privateer pension fund, from June, 1812, to July, 1837; which was, on motion of Mr. SALTONSTALL, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

2. Letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report of contracts and agreements entered into by the Board of Navy Commissioners, during the year 1839; which was, on motion of Mr. SALTONSTALL, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Navy, and ordered to be printed.

3. Depositions in relation to the New Jersey election; which were, on motion of Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania, referred to the Committee of Elections.

The following bills, returned from the Senate, with amendments, were taken from the SPEAKER's table, and the amendments were concurred in, viz:

An act for the relief of William Wickoff;
An act for the relief of James L. Cochran; and An act for the relief of John T. Addoms.

Several Senate bills on the SPEAKER's table were taken up, read twice, and appropriately referred.

Mr. HALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate to the bill for the relief of James L. Cochran was concurred in.

Mr. LINCOLN contended that it ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CROSS hoped the motion to reconsider would not prevail. Without the amendment of the Senate, the bill would be of no effect. It would give the person for whose benefit it was passed, no greater privilege than he already enjoyed in common with all other persons.

Mr. THOMPSON made some remarks in opposition to the reconsideration, and Mr. LINCOLN in favor; when

Mr. PETRIKIN obtained the floor, and moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. H. HALL demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, by unanimous consent, to save the time of the House, the yeas and nays were dispensed with, and the motion was reconsidered, and the bill was committed to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the chair, and took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The question pending when the committee rose last evening, was the amendment of Mr. PETRIKIN to increase the appropriation for the construction of the Treasury building, from $51,000 to $105,000, as modified by Mr. LINCOLN.

Mr. ADAMS defended the amendment with much animation. He contended that Government was bound in honor, and by every consideration of justice and equity, to pay these laborers for the work they had performed. He wished to ask the honorable gentleman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether he intended to adduce the condition on which this money was earned, as a reason for its not being paid. The gentleman had told them that the laborers had gone on with the work, with the express understanding that it was on their own responsibility as to whether Congress should or should not make an appropriation. But was that the reason why the gentleman refused to appropriate the money? He would tell the gentleman that if an overseer on his plantation in Virginia should permit laborers to work on the same condition, and depending on the gentleman to perform his promise, there was no court in Virginia which would not compel him to pay it. But he was sure the gentleman would never permit such a refusal to escape his lips. No; he knew that gentleman better than to think he would refuse to compensate his laborers under such circumstances. Then why did he act so differently, when the Government was concerned? Mr. A. in the course of his remarks, alluded to the certificates given to the workmen, as shinplasters of the same character as Treasury notes, and which the Government was equally bound to pay.

Mr. JONES said it appeared from the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he supposed he, Mr. J. did not understand the facts. He had, however, imagined himself throughly acquainted with the facts. But if he had not, the explanation of the gentleman, delivered in so mild a manner, could not leave him now in ignorance.

Mr. J. said, the gentleman will allow me to say that perhaps he himself has not paid sufficient attention to the matter, so as to understand what the facts are. I wish the gentleman to bear in mind, that so far from my being opposed to the payment of these men, that on more than one occasion during this debate, I have yielded my assent to the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, which is intended to cover the whole amount.

The bill would have been so drawn at first, had the money been then due; but at the time the bill was drawn, the labor had not been performed by them; and as at that time the work had not been done, of course no provision could be made to cover the present demand.

Mr. J. repeated that he admitted the justice of the claim now made, and hoped the amendment would take effect, as he had not the slightest objection to appropriating the whole amount, whatever it might be, and to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina he yielded his full assent. But the gentleman from Massachusetts had said it was a horrid affair to pay these laborers in shinplasters. Now, said Mr. J. all I have to say is, that the gentleman has a very strange idea of shinplasters. I should have thought, from the immense amount of shinplasters issued from his favorite institutions, that he would have understood the subject better. I will undertake to say that he is a great proficient in that kind of shinplasters issued in such abundance from his own State. But was a certificate given to a laborer, specifying merely the amount of labor performed, a shinplaster?

But the gentleman had said we were issuing Treasury notes, which were also shinplasters. Now if they were shinplasters, they were such as had received the sanction of some of the first men of our country. They had been approved by men in as high stations as that which the gentleman himself once occupied. These shinplasters had carried us through struggles, and brought us safely out of those struggles on more occasions than one, with honor to ourselves and to our country.

The gentleman had also spoken of a "contract." Now it seemed to him that the gentleman did not understand the nature of a contract near so well as he did that of shinplasters.

Said Mr. J., my idea of a contract is, that it implies the consent and obligation of both parties. But the gentleman comes forward and tells us that the mere assent of the President to allow these men to go on upon their own responsibility, was a contract. Now if the fact of complying with the request of these men to go on at their own risk was a contract, why then the world of reasoning by which he arrives at the conclusion, I am utterly at a loss to conceive.

When these laborers were suffered to go on, there was a distinct understanding that neither the President nor Secretary were to be responsible for any thing. The laborers said they would go on with the work solely on their own risk, and relying on an appropriation from Congress.

The gentleman had asked if it was an "honorable thing." What! had the gentleman, too, become an advocate for permitting an officer to pay money without an appropriation by law? Did the gentleman intend to say that the Secretary had a right to pay debts without authority. If so, there would be no longer any check, and the invaluable constitutional safeguard to the Treasury would be remove i.

He would again say that he had not the slightest objection that every dollar earned by these people should be paid; and that a sufficient amount should be inserted in the bill to cover their honest and hard earnings. He would be the last man on that floor to object to it.

All he said was that there was no obligation to go beyond the amount for the payment of these individuals. He was willing to pay them to the last cent, if it took every dollar from the Treasury. But when we were told that there were no means to complete these buildings, he did find fault with gentlemen who wished the appropriations doubled.

The gentleman from Massachusetts would not go through many sections of the bill before he would find an item of $75,000 for erecting a custom-house in his own State; and perhaps this $75 000 was but the entering wedge for greater appropriations.

Mr. J. then adverted to the objection of some of the Opposition to the small amount of Treasury notes, or shinplasters, as the gentleman called them, which had been required. They wished a greater amount, and if ten millions, instead of five, had been granted, it would have pleased them better.

Mr. ADAMS wished to know why the gentleman had gone out of his way to speak of the custom-house at Boston, instead of confining himself to an answer to the question propounded. Mr. A. then intimated that Mr. J. was a little offended.

Mr. JONES. No; the gentleman is mistaken. I was never in a better temper in my life.

Mr. ADAMS wished to know whether the gentleman meant when he had spoken of the "favorite institutions of the gentleman."

Mr. JONES said he referred to banks.

Mr. ADAMS begged to say that if the gentleman thought the banks were his favorite institutions, he knew very little of his opinions on the subject. His opinions on that subject were no secret; they were long since made known to the country. Mr. A. then spoke at some length in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HUNT spoke at some length in favor of the amendment proposed. Suppose, he said, the House pass the bill as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, what becomes of the $53,000 due the workmen—money earned by the sweat of the brow by the artificers and workmen on the public buildings? These workmen had been compelled to hold their certificates from October last, if they have not disposed of them to furnish necessaries of life to their families, till the present time, without one cent of interest. Will this House, for the sake of the appearance of economy, do the crying injustice to these men, by withholding the appropriation? He hoped not. Suppose, instead of making provision in this bill, the claims of these workmen should be referred to the Committee of Claims, of which his honorable colleague [Mr. RUSSELL] was chairman. He had no doubt, strict and rigid as that gentleman was in his investigation of claims, he would forthwith report a bill for the appropriation of the full amount due the hard working men to whom the Government is now in debt. Then why not put in this bill. He did not understand that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means differed as to the principle of payment, but in the terms. He called upon the gentlemen of the Administration to know whether they would so limit the appropriation in this bill, under the circumstances of the case, as to leave out the $53,000 due these mechanics—an amount legitimately belonging to this bill, and leave it to be be hereafter provided for by the Committee of Claims. It would be doing crying injustice to these meritorious men. Mr. H. concluded by expressing a wish that the debate would not be extended, but that an appropriation in proper amounts would be made.

Mr. LINCOLN said there was already $60,000 due these workmen for labor performed. The estimates furnished by the architect called for an appropriation of $105,000, and there was no good reason why it should not be appropriated. He inquired of the chairman whether it was proposed to limit the appropriation to the amount due, and discontinue the work.

Mr. JONES said that the amount called for in the bill, was all that it was thought the conditions of the Treasury would warrant the expenditure of. He thought it should be sufficient for the present. Mr. J. was understood to say that the amount of appropriation was proposed to be limited to what was due the workmen.

Mr. LINCOLN. Then the building is to stop. Mr. L. then spoke at some length to show the importance of further appropriation, on the score of economy, to continue the buildings. The materials collected would be wasted if the appropriation was withheld. It would be doing great injustic to the workmen to throw them off at this time, considering the circumstances under which they were brought here.

Mr. SALTONSTALL said if the question now was, whether these buildings should be put up, then he might hesitate about the appropriation. His creed was, that when public buildings were constructed, they should be of durable materials; and built in such a manner as would be honorable to the nation. It was not a proper economy at all times to put up a building at the smallest cost. He then spoke of the location of the public buildings now constructing, to which he objected. The Post Office building was being constructed with a beauty of material which any citizen of the country would feel a pride and gratification to behold; but, from its location in a narrow street, the whole effect is destroyed. If these buildings were abandoned in their unfinished state, the materials would remain scattered and subject to waste and ruin, unless a large appropriation was made to gather them up and take care of them. It would be disgraceful to the nation to abandon the works in their present condition, or to refuse to appropriate the amount of money due to the workmen. This Government was not so bankrupt, he said, but that it could afford the appropriation proposed in the amendment: if it was in that condition, it had better apply to the circuit court, and take the benefit. Let the Government do as an individual would do under similar circumstances, to prevent the loss of property from the want of further means to prevent it—raise the money on security or mortgage of the property, or by the issue of more Treasury notes. But he had do doubt that there would be a sufficient balance left unexpended of the amount of these notes already issued to authorize the House in making the appropriation.

Mr. MONROE advocated the amendment as a measure of economy. If the appropriation be withheld, and the workmen stopped, the dilapidation of the building would be so great, and the materials would be so scattered before it will be again commenced, that it would cost double the amount then as is now required to complete the building.

Mr. MARVIN said if there was not a single gentleman opposed to the amendment, why not take the vote upon it. If gentlemen were prepared to stop the building, let them vote against the amendment, and vice versa. True economy required that the appropriation should be made. He, therefore, hoped the question would be taken. He had no doubt there was not a man who did not properly understand the subject.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina censured the course of the Secretary of the Treasury for not recommending the amount necessary to pay the workmen for the labor already performed on this building, and for continuing the construction of the buildings. He advocated the appropriation of such an amount as would continue the employment to the workmen, and to the completion of these buildings. He would not send them off now, when no labor could be procured elsewhere; nor would he wish to see the plighted faith of the Government violated by withholding the amount due these workmen for the labor already performed for the Government. He was also opposed to saddling any future Administration with a debt incurred by the present.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. T. adverted to a censure he had passed some time ago on the Reporters of the Globe. He said he felt it his duty to admit that he had done the Reporters injustice on the occasion, as he did not believe they would, intentionally, misrepresent him.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he would ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes, whilst he paid his respects to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who had just spoken. The gentleman (said Mr. P.) has, according to his usual practice, given us a speech, one half of it on things he knows nothing about, and the other half about matters having no relevancy to the subject before the committee; something like a fish roe, thrown into a hot pan, jumping about, snapping, and cracking, and finally leaving neither form nor substance. The gentleman from South Carolina had asserted that "every patriot in the country was anxious to change the rulers of the country." This assertion, or rather denunciation, he (Mr. P.) denied, and considered of a piece with many of the gentleman's assertions, and the pretensions of many of his party to exclusive "patriotism, decency, &c." Mr. P. thought if the gentleman's patriotism was like some other matters he talked often about, and he was to be the standard by which others were to be judged, there were but few patriots in the country, and the sooner such patriots left the country, the better. Mr. P. believed, however, that there were but few men in the United States who were not patriots at heart, no matter what political party they belonged to. As to the amendment now under consideration, it was approved of by a committee, four of whom were Democrats, and one Whig, without dissent. It was prepared without regard to any man's previous opinions, and sent to this House. He (Mr. P.) was one of them, and offered the amendment. This committee acted as men of principle—never suffered political prejudices to interfere with their duty as men, in that committee room, when no party principles were involved, but judged of things submitted to them according to the facts, having due regard to doing justice to the Government and to individuals. He [Mr. T.] accuses the friends of the Administration in this House of sacrificing their morals at the shrine of party. It comes with a bad grace from the gentleman, or his party, to lecture this House on morality. A review of their actions, as legislators generally, would prove this clearly.

The discrepancy between the estimate of the amount inserted in the present bill as necessary to complete those public buildings, and the sum found now to be necessary, is easily accounted for. The estimate in the bill was made in December last, before the work was done. The amendment now offered is predicated on estimates of work principally done. Mr. P. did not consider the President to blame in this matter. He had neither time nor inclination to attend to matters of this kind; nor was Mr. P. prepard to blame the Secretary of the Treasury. He had to depend on the very uncertain information furnished by the architect, and every one knew how uncertain such data generally was. The gentleman had expressed himself as horror-stricken that the President had given directions to reduce the hours of work at the public buildings to ten hours. He has asserted that the President had directed this to be done by proclamation.

How did that gentleman ascertain this? Mr. P. would like to know his authority. It was the duty of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to make this matter public, and in discharge of his duty he did publish it, for the information of the numerous persons interested in a knowledge of it. Was this a criminal matter in the President? If he had not done it, he would have been very properly denounced in this House.

Mr. P. said he would inform the gentleman from South Carolina that it was a common thing in Pennsylvania, for those employing white men, to specify the hours for work. When this was not done to the satisfaction of the workmen, they called on their employers and stated their grievances. Mr. P. would inform the gentleman from South Carolina, that the labor of the Northern and Middle State was generally done by freemen, who knew their rights, and were not afraid to assert them. It often happened that when those workmen suppose they are aggrieved, they turn out, and as they call it, and cease working until they are satisfied. They consider themselves at liberty to work, or let it alone.

The gentleman affects a great deal of sympathy for the starving condition of the mechanics and laboring classes of society throughout the country generally. He would (said Mr. P.) take the liberty of informing the gentleman that his sympathies were misplaced, as to those men. There was no one of those classes suffering or starving, that would work, or had health. It was a fact that around the large manufacturing districts there was some suffering, caused by the gross, dishonest conduct of the gentleman's friends, the banks, but the mass of the laboring class were far from being in a suffering state. All who would work could get employment and fair wages. Mr. P. could speak knowingly on this subject. He was in the habit of employing a large number of workmen. A year ago he paid laborers from $1 12½ to $1 25 per day, when they had to pay for beef from 8 to 10 cents per pound; for bacon from 16 to 19 cents per pound; and for flour from 8 to 10 dollars per barrel. Now laborers were paid 87½ cents per day. They bought their beef for from 4 to 6 cents per pound; bacon from 7 to 12 cents per pound; and flour $5 per barrel. Now, said Mr. P. can the gentleman from South Carolina tell, by cyphering, which set of prices is the best for the laboring men? Mr. P. regretted to hear gentlemen dragging every subject that came before this House into the arena of politics, no matter how foreign from the subject. It did not say much for the morality of those doing so. Mr. P. went on to urge the adoption of the amendment as a benefit to the public, by preserving the buildings, and rendering the records now in it safe.

The House again resolved itself into committee and resumed the consideration of the bill.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. PETRIKIN, a count was taken by tellers, (Messrs. BRIGGS and CHAPMAN of Alabama acting as such,) who reported—ayes 89, noes 43. So the amendment was agreed to.

The clause appropriating $45,000 for continuing the construction of the new Patent Office building having been read,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out $45,000, and to insert "$100,000 to complete the said building, including for entire occupancy, and for the portico."

Mr. P said that this amount was in conformity with the estimates of the Commissioner of Public Buildings. The building would be damaged and ruined if the amount proposed was not appropriated.

After a few remarks from Mr. STANLY, the committee was divided on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. PETRIKIN, and there being—ayes 55, noes 38, no quorum voting,

The committee rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. LINCOLN moved a call of the House; and Messrs. GRIFFITH and PROFFIT having been appointed tellers to ascertain whether there should be a call, reported that there were—ayes 90, noes 34.

A call was ordered, but there being a quorum present, by univeral consent, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with, and

Mr. LINCOLN moved to amend the amendment by striking out $45,000, and inserting, after the word "dollars," the words, "to complete the said building for entire occupancy, together with the portico," including arrearages of $42,000 due to the workmen.

Mr. PETRIKIN accepted the above as a modification of his.

After a few remarks from Messrs. LINCOLN and PETRIKEN in favor of the amendment, and by Messrs. PROFFIT, JONES of Virginia, STANLY, and BOND, in explanation of the expenditures of the building,

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out $155,000 for alterations and repairs of the Capitol, and incidental expenses, &c.; but after a few explanatory remarks by Messrs. JONES of Virginia, and LINCOLN, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out $1,200 salary to the principal officer, and insert the sum of $1,000.

Mr. LINCOLN said he was opposed to the amendment. The salary of this officer was increased last session by the action of both Houses of Congress, after the most mature consideration. This gentleman has the superintendence of the whole of the public grounds, amounting to about one hundred acres. He was not as well paid as the common laborer under his charge, considering the amount of his labors. You cannot procure the services of a competent man any where. He remains in the service of the Government at a less amount than he could get elsewhere. He could get more from any private gentleman who was acquainted with his capacity to attend to their grounds, if his services were needed. He was actually astonished at the quantity of grounds he had to attend, and the great amount of labor he had to perform. He referred gentlemen to the condition of the public grounds now as compared with its condition before he was taken into the employ of the Government, as an evidence of his merit.

Mr. J. W. JONES said he was much in the situation of the chairman of the Committee on the Public Buildings. When Mr. J. came to look at the subject, he was much astonished on becoming acquainted with the amount of business under the superintendent's charge. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] said that the superintendant had something like one hundred acres of public grounds under his superintendence, and had shown that their condition was such as to satisfy every one that the superintendent was a faithful agent. Those members who were in Congress six years ago would be surprised to see the state of the public grounds, compared with their former condition. Something like five acres was in shrubbery and ornamental trees, and kept in the most beautiful condition. The superintendent had not less than five miles of walks to attend to, besides the trimming of trees. His attention was devoted to all those services. Gentlemen would find him to be a serviceable man.

Mr. STANLY made some remarks, in the course of which he censured Mr. LINCOLN for testifying to the merits of the gardener. He said Mr. L. made himself a pack horse for all the abuses of the Administration.

Mr. LINCOLN said it was his duty as chairman of the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds (under whose supervision the labors and duties of this gentleman came,) being perfectly conversant with the subject, to testify to his qualifications. He also felt it due, from a sense of propriety, and a sense of justice to this individual, that he should give to the committee the information he possessed.

Mr. STANLY again spoke.

Mr. LINCOLN thought it true economy to pay this individual $1,200. He saves the Government, by his care and attention, an amount equal to half his salary. Since he had been in the employment of the Government, he had cultivated a great number of plants; and the Government had been put to very little expense for shrubbery. He is a scientific gardener, and a man of great skill. Gentlemen in New York and Philadelphia were anxious to get him out of the employment of the Government; and he had no doubt he would have gone if the salary had not been increased last year. He was in favor of continuing the appropriation; if it was not done he had no doubt that he would leave this city.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. STANLY, and disagreed to without a count.

Mr. JONES of Virginia submitted the following amendment to the bill, viz:

"For compensation to the Judge of the Superior Court of St. Augustine, East Florida, for examination of claims under the act of June 23, 1834, for the years 1839 and 1840, one thousand nine hundred and forty-five dollars: Provided, That all said claims in which proof shall not be produced to the said Judge, and deemed by him to be satisfactory, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, within the period of eighteen months from the date of the passage of this act, shall be dismissed; and no further proceedings under the act aforesaid shall be had; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby required to give notice of the limitation herein provided, by publication in the several newspapers printed in the Territory of Florida, for the period of six months after the passage of this act."

Mr. GRAVES raised a question of order. He considered the amendment out of order, on the ground that there was no existing law authorizing the appropriation; and

After a few remarks by Messrs. GIDDINGS, JONES of Virginia, and GRAVES,

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order; and it was not pressed by the mover.

Mr. OGLE moved to strike out $3,665 for repairs of the President's house.

Mr. OGLE then took the floor, and said he would commence by the examination of a speech delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] some time ago, in reply to certain charges in relation to the President's furniture, etc.

Mr. O. in his preliminary remarks, used, in reference to Mr. LINCOLN, the term "palace influence." He also spoke of certain persons, who, perhaps, were in the habit of visiting the White House, shaking the President's taper fingers, and sipping his wine.

Mr. LINCOLN desired to know what the gentleman meant by "palace influence."

Mr. OGLE said he would explain as he progressed with his speech.

Mr. LINCOLN said he wished an answer then, as he would submit to no personal abuse or imputation of his motives from any one. He would tell the gentleman that he had been in the President's House, and drank less of his wines than perhaps the gentleman himself.

Mr. OGLE was understood to disclaim any intention of impugning the motives of Mr. LINCOLN, or as intending any thing personal. He then took up the speech alluded to, and was proceeding to examine it, when

Mr. LINCOLN said it might be as well to inform the gentleman that the speech in question was delivered one evening about a fortnight ago, and he had not seen it in the Globe, nor did he know it had been published, until a few hours ago. He had left the city at six o'clock the next morning after it was delivered, and consequently had no opportunity of revising it before its publication. He had, however, told the gentleman that he observed some little inaccuracies in the report, which he would correct as soon as he should have time to write out a correction, and, under these circumstances, he could not repress his astonishment at the course the gentleman was then taking. He would, however, set patiently until the gentleman had got through with his abuse, when he would reply to him.

Mr. OGLE then resumed his remarks, and poured out anathemas against the Reporter of the Globe, who, owing to the noise which generally prevails in the hall, had been guilty of not hearing a portion of Mr. LINCOLN's speech, which led to a trifling error. The other inaccuracy was a misprint of a single figure, and not the fault of the Reporter.

Towards the close of his remarks, Mr. O. referred to the speech of his colleague, [Gen. KEIM,] delivered some time ago, on the same subject, and was proceeding to speak of certain shinplasters issued in the county of Berks.

For this he was called to order, on the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. KEIM hoped his colleague would be permitted to go on, and empty his reservoir of filth at once.

Mr. OGLE then resumed, and concluded his remarks.

Mr. LINCOLN followed, and with much warmth, and in a most withering manner, repelled the insinuations thrown out by the member who last spoke. [The remarks of Mr. L. will appear at the earliest opportunity.]

The clause of the bill appropriating $8,000 for the payment of the artists engaged in executing four historical paintings for the vacant panels of the rotunda of the Capitol, having been read,

Mr. LINCOLN moved the following amendment, which was accepted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, viz: Provided the paintings are in such a state of progress as, in reference to the whole sum to be paid to the artists respectively, for their execution, shall, in the opinion of the President of the United States, render it proper to make such payments.

After a few remarks from Messrs. ANDREWS, JONES of Virginia, STANLY, LEWIS WILLIAMS, and ADAMS, as to the nature of the contract, the amendment was agreed to.

The paragraph appropriating $8,000 to Luigi Persico and Horatio Greenough for statues to adorn the two blockings on the east front of the Capitol, having been read,

Mr. LINCOLN moved the following amendment, which was accepted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and agreed to, viz:

"Provided, That the work is in such a state of progress as in reference to the whole sum to be paid to the artists respectively for their execution, shall, in the opinion of the President of the United States, render it proper to make such payments."

Mr. J. W. JONES moved to strike out the appropriation of $725,000 for the expenses of taking the next census, and insert $740,000; which was agreed to.

Some conversation here took place between Messrs. WADDY THOMPSON, EVANS, and SMITH of Maine, as to the manner in which the custom-house at New York was constructed, and as to the propriety of reducing that appropriation.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky moved to strike it out.

Mr. LINCOLN opposed the amendment, and showed that the amount now proposed to be appropriated was $75,000 less than the estimates called for. The site had been altered since the building was authorized to be constructed. It was thought advisable to have it located in a position more convenient to the shipping than was at first contemplated. The consequence was, that the land on which it is located cost considerably more than that on which it was proposed to locate it at first.

After a few remarks by Mr. JONES of Virginia, showing the necessity of the appropriation, the question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. J. W. JONES moved an amendment for the repair of the public works at Staten Island, the sum of $29,720; which had been rendered necessary in consequence of the late storm; which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LINCOLN here moved that the committee rise; and on a count being taken by tellers to ascertain whether the committee would rise, no quorum voted.

The committee then rose, and the chrirman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. ANDREWS moved a call of the House; but a motion having been made that the House adjourn, the question was taken by tellers, (Messrs GOGGIN and CHAPMAN acting as such,) who reported—ayes 29, nays 96.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS moved an appropriation of $27,500 to purchase a lot of ground on the east side of the custom-house, Pine street, in New York, for the purpose of light and ventilation to that building; and

After a few remarks by Mr. C. in favor of the amendment, and Mr. JONES of Virginia, on the question whether it was in order,

The CHAIR ruled that the amendment was not in order on the ground that there was no existing law that would authorize the appropriation.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved the following amendments, viz:

For repairs of the custom-house building at New Bedford, $500.

For repairs of the custom-house building at New London, $1,700.

For repairs of the marine hospital at Norfolk, $4.100.

After a few remarks by Messrs. STANLY, JONES, CURTIS, and MONROE, the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. J. W. JONES moved to reduce the appropriation for the expenses incurred by the commission, under the act remitting duties on goods destroyed by fire in New York, from $3,354, to the sum of $1,350; and after a debate in which Messrs. STANLY, DAWSON, CURTIS, and EVANS, participated, and inexplanation by Mr. J. W. JONES, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to strike out the appropriation for the full minister to Spain, for the purpose of sending a Charge, if the President should think the relations subsisting between these two countries deemed it warrantable; and,

After a debate in which Messrs. J. W. JONES, ADAMS, EVERETT, and EVANS, participated, the latter gentleman moved the following amendment as a modification of the above, to come in at the end of the paragraph making provision for the salaries of the ministers abroad, viz:

Provided, That the sum of nine thousand dollars, or such part thereof as may be necessary, may be applied to the outfit and salary of a Charge d'Affaires to Spain in lieu of a Minister.

Mr. DROMGOOLE accepted the above as a modification.

Mr. STANLY obtained floor; and on his motion the committee rose; and then

On motion, the House, at 11 o'clock, p. m.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, May 2, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840.

The question pending was on a motion made by Mr. EVANS, to allow the money appropriated for the salary of the Minister to Spain, in case of his return, to be applied to a Charge, to be sent in his place, if the President should think proper so to do.

Mr. CUSHING observed there was no quorum, and that with so few members present, it would not be fair to take the question.

Mr. STANLY said he would take that opportunity to say a few words in relation to Messrs. Throop and Maxcy, our Charges at Belgium and Naples. He then referred to the report of the Investigating Committee, for the purpose of showing that Mr. Throop had been negligent, while acting as naval officer at New York, or he might have prevented the frauds of Swartwout. Also, that Mr. Maxcy, when acting as Solicitor of the Treasury, had, through his negligence, been one cause of the frauds of Mr. Price. He wished to know from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, how it was that these men had been promoted to office, instead of being punished for their negligence.

Mr. SMITH of Maine called Mr. STANLY to order, on the ground that his remarks were not relevant to the question then before the committee.

Mr. STANLY contended that he was no more out of order than many other gentlemen.

Mr. CUSHING made some brief remarks on the amendment of Mr. EVANS. He was of opinion that the Department had the discretionary power, but thought the mission to Spain would have to be restored.

Mr. JONES having been late in his arrival, had failed to hear much of what Mr. STANLY had said. That gentleman had a standing piece of evidence on which to found charges against any thing and every thing that came up in discussion. Mr. J's objection to it was, that it was an ex parte investigation, directed to objects never contemplated when the committee was appointed, and the officers charged had had no opportunity of reply and defence. He protested against allowing such a sort of proof to operate against any individual. He contended that, in the case of Mr. Throop, his nomination had been submitted to the Senate. As to the salary of the architect, the office was necessary, and applied to the works of the highest order. And if the salary was reduced, the Government could not command the services of a competent individual. The salary was, in fact, fixed by law, but was left discretionary with the President. Mr. J. opposed a change of minister for charge in the Austrian, Prussian, and Mexican missions. The first two powers complained of a violation of treaty on our part, and it was proper that ministers of the first grade should be retained in ports so important. A treaty had lately been concluded with Sardinia, relating a subject of high importance, providing for the introduction and transportation of tobacco to all the limits of that kingdom, extending to the borders of Switzerland, France, &c. and thus opened the door to an extension of the tobacco trade. All the 22 cantons of Switzerland, save one, (Vallais,) were free to its admission. In France it was a Government monopoly, and sold under high duties to the population, producing to the French Government a revenue more than half as great as that of the United States, from all sources whatever.

Mr. BELL called the attention of Mr. JONES to the superintendence of the architect of the public buildings. He thought the circumstances were such as called loudly for some provision of law. He then recurred to disbursements made for the erection of the branch mint at Dahlonega, in Georgia. The officers by whom these disbursements were made were appointed, he believed, at the discretion of the President, and no law existed requiring securities to be taken. In relation to the buildings in this city the Board of Inspectors, without any direct violation of law, had brought Congress under an obligation which no House of Representatives dare refuse to discharge. He did not refer to this as a charge against the Administration, but only to show the need of further provision on that subject.

Mr. JONES said the Committee of Ways and Means had not had this subject before them, and no bill had been drawn in the case.

Mr. BELL referred to the case of work done on the raft of the Red river, where Congress had been brought under a similar obligation without any authority of law. Here there were three cases, all showing the necessity of further legal provision to prevent the recurrence of such abuses.

Mr. JONES could not see how this subject particularly pertained to the Committee of Ways and Means. It seemed impossible to satisfy gentlemen. If, in such cases, men were not employed, the Administration were blamed; if men were employed, the Administration were no less censured. Mr. J. invited Mr. B. to present a bill to suit the cases referred to by him. It should have Mr. J's hearty support.

Mr. BELL rejoined, reminding Mr. J. that he had expressly disclaimed all intention to bring any charge in this matter against the Government. As to his own bringing in a bill on the subject, he perceived it would be utterly in vain. There might certainly be some arrangement in relation to the buildings at Washington, fixing the responsibility somewhere, and let it be no longer vagrant between the architect, superintendent, and Board of Inspectors. Let some one have legal control of disbursements, so that responsibility might be fixed.

The question being now put, the amendment was agreed to.

So it was left discretional with the Executive Department to replace the Minister to Spain by a Charge.

Mr. CUSHING made explanations, and adverted to a report, stated to him in letters, &c. that Great Britain was endeavoring to obtain from Mexico possession of Upper California, with a view to its relation to the territories of the United States, and also of taking a cession of territory as security for Mexican bonds in England. She was said, also, to have in view the establishment in that quarter of a colony of free blacks. Hence he urged the necessity of sleepless vigilance over the movements of the British Government in Mexico. If the object of England be accomplished (said Mr. C.) we shall be in the grasp of the boa constrictor. He was opposed to any further extension of British territory on the American frontier. His argument, from these views, was, that a minister should be retained in Mexico. He also opposed any change in the Prussian and Austrian missions, and went into some remarks on the importance of our interests with the Austrian Government, especially in reference to tobacco and cotton. One of the benefits obtained for our trade by the late minister at Austria had been the removal of a forty days' quarantine in her ports. He dwelt on the advantages thus obtained for the cotton trade. Similar benefits were to be hoped for the tobacco trade and the fisheries. The cost of the mission was a bagatelle, in comparison to these benefits. He then examined the importance of our mission to Prussia. A Prussian arbiter was to settle all questions arising between us and Mexico, on our treaty with the latter. Prussia was at the head of the German commercial league, which was gradually revolutionizing the trade of the continent, entirely to the advantage of American trade and manufactures; and hence he opposed a substitution of a charge for a minister at the Prussian Court. Negotiations, at this day, had reference chiefly to commercial treaties—which afforded an indication of the spread and strength of the spirit of peace among the nations.

He agreed with Mr. JONES as to the beneficial character of the late treaty with Sardinia, and argued the propriety of our having a charge in that country. The relations thus established were important in a political as well as commercial point of view. We were competitors with France and England, which exposed us to collisions with both those powers, and hence it was our interest to be on amicable relations with the other nations of Europe who had little maritime power, especially those on the Mediterranean.

Mr. C. concluded by expressing his hope that the missions to Austria, Prussia, and Mexico, would be suffered to remain as they were.

Mr. PROFFIT commented on the remarks of Mr. C. as improper from a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. That gentleman's remarks on a former occasion had operated injuriously to us abroad, and tended to produce an impression that there was a party in this country jealous and unfriendly towards great Britain.

Mr. CUSHING, in defence, adverted to suggestions made last evening by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] and insisted that his remarks were in order, and to the point. Because he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was his mouth to be closed in all that related to our foreign affairs? It was an extraordinary doctrine, and applied to no other committee. He had adverted not to mere rumors, but to subjects with which British publications were teeming. Were we to be restrained from discussing our own affairs in our own way, from a dread of the British newspapers, or some sensitive member of the British Parliament? He might speak by the hour, the day, or the week, on party questions, and nobody would say a word against it; but as soon as he touched the vital, permanent interests of the nation, he was to be lectured, and catechized, and choked down. He spoke as he had a right to speak; as a member of the House and of Congress, as an American, he claimed a right to speak freely and fully on all national questions.

Mr. EVERETT adverted to the remarks he had made last evening. What he had said then he had not said as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but simply on his own responsibility. He had trodden with great care; he had made no motion to strike out the clause in question, but had only suggested some changes in the grades of some of our foreign ministers, with a view to economy. He had no wish to dispense with any mission, such as those to Prussia and Austria, which was beneficial to Southern interests, so long as they were doing any thing; but if not, he was for reducing their expense. He had had the impression that, since our treaty with Mexico, there could be no duties which required the presence of a full minister there. He should make no motion, but, leave the question to the discretion of the Executive.

Mr. PROFFIT responded with warmth to Mr. CUSHING; and being called to order, and ruled to be out of order, resumed his seat.

Mr. STANLY then moved to strike out the item for salaries to Charges to Belgium and Naples, on the ground that their neglecting to prevent the frauds of Messrs. Price and Swartwout, disqualified them for so responsible a station.

Mr. DROMGOOLE contended, that admitting the allegation were true, that was no reason why our relations with Belgium and Naples should cease, which would be the effect of the gentleman's motion, should it prevail. He said it would be obvious that the withholding of a minister's salary did put an end, while it continued, to our intercourse with a nation to whom such minister was sent. The incompetency of individuals, even admitted, was no reason for discontinuing a public mission abroad. He would not be drawn into a consideration of the charges formerly reported against these individuals. They had been lawfully appointed. No complaint was made of the discharge of their duties abroad, and he would not vote to discontinue their salaries.

Messrs. GRAVES and GRAHAM of North Carolina advocated the amendment.

Mr. VANDERPOEL thought this a most extraordinary proceeding. The report of the Investigating Committee had been quoted, which report referred to men who had no notice of such examination, some of whom were abroad at the time it took place, and at home the whole proceeding was ex parte. Gentlemen wished to cut off the salaries of Messrs. Maxcy and Throop, both of whom were out of the country at the time the committee were at New York. Was such a course fair? Was the House resolved into a star chamber to condemn men without notice, or opportunity to defend themselves? Mr. V. then alluded to the friendship which existed between Swartwout and the Whigs, and to the fact that, when the former left office, the merchants presented him with a service of plate, as a testimony of their esteem. The fault of Messrs. Maxcy and Throop was, that, with men of all parties, they had placed too much confidence in him, and yet for this confidence, their services abroad, how valuable soever, must be cut off. He thought it very unjust.

Mr. SMITH of Maine contended that the item in the bill did not at all involve the qualifications of the incumbents of the office proposed to be abolished. He then called the attention of the committee to a case of culpable neglect and extravagance which had once excited the attention of the whole country. He alluded to the appointment of General Harrison as Minister Plenipotentiary to Colombia by Mr. Adams. It would be found that the hero of North Bend received his $9,000 outfit and $9,000 salary, as Minister to Colombia, and yet, instead of proceeding at once to his post—

Messrs. C. JOHNSON, GRAVES, and others, here called Mr. S. to order, on the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. SMITH. Ah! I see how it is. I see the shot tells. Whenever I have a shot that tells, I always know it, because the pigeons flutter. I generally take pretty good aim, and it it perhaps natural that the birds should flutter, when they know the shot will take effect.

After some debate on the point of order, the CHAIR decided that Mr. SMITH was in order.

Mr. SMITH then resumed, and said it was a well known fact that, after the appointment of Gen. Harrison as Minister to Colombia, at a salary of $9,000, with an outfit of $9,000, instead of proceeding at once to his post, he remained quietly luxuriating for six months at his palace at North Bend; and it was not until after the election of the Hero of New Orleans that he saw the necessity of making tracks for Colombia. This could not be denied; and while gentlemen were attempting to implicate Messrs. Maxcy and Throop, by a report not acted upon by the House, he wished them to remember the conduct of the Hero of North Bend.

After some remarks from Mr. GRAVES,

Mr. ADAMS said he had no recollection as to whether Gen. Harrison had, or had not, received the amount of his salary and outfit. He believed, however, that the general practice had been not to pay ministers their outfits until they were ready to set out on their missions, and never to advance them their salaries till they set out. From this general rule there were many exceptions, to enable gentlemen, in particular cases, to settle their private affairs, before leaving the country, and there might have been some advances of outfit, but none, so far as he knew, of salary. If there were such in the case of Gen. Harrison, he knew there were circumstances which, if made known, would justify it. Mr. A. then complained that whenever a charge was made against any officer, which it was in the power of Congress to correct, the gentlemen from Maine would call up some case of equal or greater corruption which happened previously.

Mr. SMITH. That is a very good mode of settling accounts.

Mr. STANLY contended that the President, in appointing Messrs. Throop and Maxcy to office, had treated the report of the Investigating Committee with contempt. He replied to Mr. DROMGOOLE, whose course, he said, was harder to define than that of an eagle in the air, or a serpent on a rock.

Mr. CURTIS was proceeding to defend the course of the Investigating Committee, of which he had been a member, when

Mr. VANDERPOEL disclaimed having intimated any impropriety on the part of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS then quoted largely from the report, with a view of showing that had Mr. Throop exercised proper caution, the defalcations of Swartwout would never have occurred. He had no idea that Mr. Throop had connived at the fraud committed, but had he done his duty that fraud could never have succeeded. Mr. C. was understood to deny that any service of plate had been presented to Swartwout.

Mr. VANDERPOEL rejoined. He had hitherto forborne to enter into the political discussions of the House, but when he heard old and long tried friends accused, who had honorably discharged high and important duties, he could not sit still and abstain from defending them. He then went into a review of Mr. Throop's political history, and to the time when he was elevated to the gubernatorial chair of the State of New York. Yes, said Mr. V. I remind my colleague of the good old time when he and I worked shoulder to shoulder in supporting Mr. Throop and the Jackson cause. Mr. V. represented that the head and front of the offence was, that Mr. Throop had been too confiding in Mr. Swartwout. His colleague could not, and dare not, intimate any thing against his honor and integrity. Then, was it an honorable and Christian spirit to visit such an offence by cutting off the present appropriation?

Mr. CURTIS denied having said any thing further against Mr. Throop than his neglect of the duties of his station. He was set as a check upon Swartwout, and his confidence in his friend had induced him wholly to neglect the duties he was appointed to perform.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked, where was the necessity of going back to the neglects of an individual's past life. Such a principle, if carried out would lead to the most disastrous consequences. He cited the case of excessive confidence reposed by the directors of a bank in their cashier. The bank exploded, but were the directors visited with unrelenting condemnation ever after? He protested against such a course.

Mr. DROMGOOLE contended that, should an impeachment be instituted against these Charges, as such, the testimony of their conduct in another office would be pronounced irrelevant. His principal object, however, in rising, was to notice the strange inconsistency of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] in first comparing him to a serpent on the rock, then to an eagle in the air, next to an arrow, and, last of all, he had invested him with the agility of a cat.

Mr. DAWSON was in favor of withholding the salaries, as in his opinion the President would be thereby compelled to withdraw the officers. He contended that the President had not treated the report with proper respect in omitting to notice and act upon the charges made against Messrs. Maxcy and Throop.

Mr. RHETT wished to know if, when an officer was appointed by the President and Senate, and Congress refused the appropriation, the debt was thereby extinguished.

Mr. STANLY replied that the appropriation was not for services rendered.

Mr. RHETT said the Constitution gave the President power to appoint, with the consent of the Senate. While he was kept in office, a contract subsisted, and a debt accrued. The contract would be vacated by impeachment only; till then, the debt subsisted. He would not say that in an extreme case an extreme remedy might not be proper; but a vote to withhold the salary would not extinguish the debt.

Mr. MASON of Ohio supported the amendment, and maintained that as the report of the committee on the negligence of the officers in question was unanimous, it was entitled to consideration by the President, who, at least, ought to have called upon them to answer the charges.

Mr. TURNEY reminded Mr. M. that the report of the Investigating Committee had never received the sanction of the House.

Mr. M. replied that the committee had reported evidence which had been printed, and had remained before the House for more than a year uncontroverted. This presented a case of prima facie evidence on which it was proper and fit to withhold this appropriation, at least for once, till a better understanding could be had as to the facts.

Mr. McKAY admitted the report to have been unanimous, but the House had never acted on it; and this was made the ground of a motion, in a different Congress, to which that report had not been made, at once to jump to the conclusion that two men had been guilty of malfeasance in office, and to withhold their salaries. It was monstrous. If the Executive was bound to notice and act on every report made in Congress, his condition was very unenviable. Mr. McK. adverted to a report of a committee against Gen. Hamilton, when Secretary of the Treasury, but said that Gen. Washington took no notice of it. He then referred to the celebrated Retrenchment Committee, of which the then President had taken as little notice. He protested against the doctrine as an enormity.

After some remarks from Mr. ADAMS,

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky controverted the charges of Mr. SMITH against Gen. Harrison, and thought that gentleman ought now to retract what he had said.

Mr. SMITH recapitulated his former statement in relation to Gen. Harrison, and denied that Mr. WHITE had disproved a single word.

Mr. WHITE denied the truth of the charges.

Mr. SMITH reiterated them.

Mr. PETRIKIN called Mr. SMITH to order; after which, the question on the amendment being put,

Tellers were demanded, and the vote being taken, resulted as follows: Ayes 44, noes 65.

No quorum having voted, the committee rose and reported the fact to the House.

[It was now near 6 o'clock.]

Mr. ANDREWS moved a call of the House. The vote was taken by tellers, and resulted as follows: Ayes 61, noes 73.

So the House refused to order a call.

A quorum being now present, the House returned into committee.

The question recurring on allowing Mr. SMITH of Maine to proceed in his remarks, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—Ayes 43, noes 74.

No quorum voting—

The question was again put, and decided in the negative: Ayes 50, noes 93.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved that the committee rise.

Mr. STANLY said the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POPE] was entitled to the floor, having yielded it only for explanation.

Mr. POPE commenced speaking.

Mr. SMITH made a question of order, claiming the floor; but the CHAIR persisted in giving it to Mr. POPE.

Mr. ANDREWS replied with some warmth to the cries of "question" which were loudly vociferated. He then adverted to the action of the people in choosing their own President, and animadverted on the course of men who, while they continually complimented the people on their intelligence, spent days and weeks in discussing the Presidential question.

The question was then put on the amendmendment (viz, to strike out the appropriation for a Charge to Belgium and to Naples) and decided in the negative—ayes 26, noes not counted.

This item for a Minister to Holland was, on motion of Mr. JONES, stricken out, it having been inserted by mistake.

The appropriation for outfits for a Minister to Russia and Charge to Sardinia was altered from $18,000 to $13,500.

Mr. TRIPLETT moved to insert $12,000 for agents to look after the tobacco interest in Europe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The appropriations for the Post Office Department having been read—

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky inquired whether the Post Office had an agent in Europe, and what were his duties and compensation?

Mr. JONES replied that he was sent to collect information as to mail facilities; it was believed by the Postmaster General that it would be important to get this information. His salary was that he had before been in receipt of as a clerk in that office.

Mr. DAVIS inquired as to the cost of this agency?

Mr. JONES was not able to reply exactly. The agent received his salary and travelling expenses. There were, unavoidably, many such agents employed in this country, to detect depredations on the mail, &c.

The bill having been read through—

Mr. JONES wished a correction in the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, making it conform to law.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky offered an amendment reducing, pro rata, the salaries of all officers over $1,000, in case the Sub-Treasury bill shall become a law, with an exception in reference to the President, the Judges, and the Commissioner of Pensions.

The CHAIR decided the amendment not to be in order.

Mr. DAVIS took an appeal. The amendment did not touch the salaries themselves, but merely the appropriations in this bill. The amendment had been drawn with strict reference to the rules of the House. He had consulted gentlemen long experienced in questions of order.

The CHAIR admitted that he had decided differently, but the committee had repeatedly reversed his decision.

Mr. DAVIS argued his appeal.

Mr. WICK said he had two speeches ready—one on matters and thing in general, and another on economy, the economy of this House, and would offer an amendment to that of his friend from Kentucky. He wished it to be read for information.

[The amendment offered by Mr. WICK proposed to razee the pay of members of Congress twenty-five per cent.]

The CHAIR said the question was on the appeal.

The question being put, the decision of the CHAIR was sustained—yeas 109, nays 21.

Mr. JONES moved that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House; which being carried nem. con. the committee rose accordingly and reported the bill.

Mr. TURNEY moved the previous question, which was seconded, and, being put, as follows: "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the reading of all the amendments, and some of them were read accordingly; when the reading was suspended.

The previous question was then put, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 110, nays 48:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, J. W. Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William O. The main question was then put, in succession, on the several amendments made in Committee of the Whole, and they were all concurred in. The question then recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed for its third reading, the yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted—yeas 145, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Bell, Black, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, A. V. NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Carter, Garret Davis, Deberry, Edwards, Rice Garland, Gates, Giddings, Graves, Green, Ogle, Proffit, Stanly, John White, and Lewis Williams—15.

The bill was then read a third time.

The previous question was then moved, seconded, put, and carried on the passage of the bill, and the bill was passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a resolution for meeting on Monday at 8 o'clock, with a view to then adjourning over to Thursday, (to allow of the cleaning of the hall, taking up carpets, etc.)

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected.

Mr. BRIGGS made an explanation.

Mr. DROMGOOLE persisted in his objection.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer his proposition.

Some member moved to adjourn. The question being put, the ayes were 66, the noes 78.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question being then put on suspending the rules to enable Mr. BRIGGS to offer his motion,

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; but

The House refused to order them; and the rules were suspended—ayes 120, noes 25.

The resolution offered by Mr. BRIGGS was then moved, and the previous question thereon was seconded, put, and carried; and the main question being on its adoption,

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them. The resolution was then carried—ayes 107, noes 23.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 3, 1840.

In the Globe of yesterday, in my remarks relative to the Bank of North Carolina purchasing the gold coined by the branch mint at Charlotte, in that State, the following sentence occurs: "It was a notorious fact, that in one single day, that bank bought up a half million of dollars in specie, and put afloat their worthless paper in its stead." It should have been: "Mr. M. said it was a notorious fact, that the bank did purchase up this gold when coined by the mint, with their own paper; but of that we the people did not complain—they had a right to do so. That was a fair business transaction. But what we the people do complain of is, that the bank, after collecting the gold into their vaults, turn the keys upon it, lock it up from circulation among the honest holders of their notes, perhapes the very notes they, the bank, had purchased it with, and compel the people either to sue them, or submit to a shave at some one of those shaving shops, and that, too, very often with a Magnum Bonum razor, to procure funds that will answer their purposes, and then falsely charge the Van Buren party with these foul acts." This is the substance of what I said upon that subject. I speak at times rapidly, and I do not wonder that mistakes like this happen. You will please correct it, and should I write out my remarks I will place the matter correct before the public.

Respectfully, yours,
W. MONTGOMERY.

Messrs. BLAIR & RIVES.

Messrs. BLAIR & RIVES: In the publication last evening, of the proceedings of the House, in Committee of the Whole, upon the appropriation bill, some remarks made by me are erroneously applied to an appropriation for the custom-house in NEW YORK, which were offered in opposition to a motion by Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky, to strike out the appropriation proposed for the custom-house in BOSTON. I shall be obliged by the proper correction of this mistake.

Your obedient servant,
LEVI LINCOLN.

Washington, May 5, 1840.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 4, 1840.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a communication from the Governor of Michigan, transmitting a copy of the third annual report of the Geologist of that State; which was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

The bill from the House making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the United States for the year 1840, was read; when

Mr. WRIGHT observed that he felt it his duty to say that the Committee on Finance had held a meeting this morning, and had examined this bill. They proposed to make very few amendments, and these would be very simple. They would therefore be ready, if it was the pleasure of the Senate, to report back the bill in twenty minutes.

Mr. W. then moved to refer it to the Committee on Finance; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON presented a memorial from Burrington Anthony, Marshal of Rhode Island, praying that the proceedings on mesne and final process, under authority of the United States, may be made to conform to the laws of the several States respectively; which, after Mr. CLAYTON had mentioned that the case was provided for in the general bankrupt law now before the body, was laid on the table.

Mr. WALL submitted certain amendments which he proposed to move to the substitute offered to the bill for a general bankrupt law, when it should be taken up for consideration; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of Henry Marsh, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. N. gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Henry Marsh.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the United States, for the year 1840, with amendments, which were read; after which,

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the bill be taken up for consideration now.

Mr. DAVIS hoped that the bill would not be considered to-day. He had not yet had an opportunity of examining it, and he thought that a bill embracing such a variety of objects should not be acted on without allowing to every Senator an opportunity of giving it a thorough examination.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that his anxiety to get the action of the Senate on this bill would, he was sure, be appreciated by the Senator from Massachusetts. The bill had only come to them to-day, and this was a very late period of the session for the passage of a bill on which so many interests of the country depended. He thought, from the disposition of the body to adjourn over, if it was not acted on to-day, it would not probably be acted on this week. Mr. W. then adverted to the urgency for a speedy action on this bill. In addition to the vast number of persons employed about the seat of Government, and many others who had not received any compensation for their services since the first of January, the courts of justice were now sitting in several of the States, and in the Senator's own State particularly, and they had no means to pay their jurors, witnesses, &c. until this bill passed. The committee had, under these circumstances, felt it their duty to press its passage with all convenient speed, and had therefore made very few and simple amendments, such as would not consume time in the other branch of Congress. If it was the pleat sure of the Senate to take up the bill now, it would certainly be gratifying to the committee.

Mr. DAVIS had no intention to delay the bill unnecessarily; but it was but a few minutes since this voluminous bill came into the chamber, and they were now called on to take it up and act on it without having had time to examine it. This was hardly reasonable, however pressing the emergency of the Government might be. It was true that the bill had undergone a variety of discussion in the other House, but it had not been examined here. If the Senator from New York would fix on some reasonable day for the consideration of this bill, he would concur with him in taking it up at that time. But it ought to be looked into to see if all the objects are provided for that ought to be in it, and if any are embraced in it that ought not to be there. It was doubtful, too, whether there was a quorum present.

Mr. WRIGHT said he felt it to be his duty to persist in his motion. He would be perfectly willing, if it was the pleasure of the Senate, to lay the bill over till to-morrow; but if the object was to have it printed with the amendments, by that time, it could not be done. If the gentleman wished to examine the amendments of the committee, he had only to go to the CLERK'S table, where he could become acquainted with them in a few minutes, as there were only three of them. He did not apprehend that the amendments would create any discussion. He was anxious to facilitate the passage of the bill so far as the Senate was concerned, and make it the law of the land.

Mr. HUBBARD said that this bill was in almost precisely the same words as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, and as printed and laid on our tables a month since. It had undergone a long and searching investigation in the House, and but a few unimportant alterations had been made, and they principally in the reduction of salaries. He hoped the bill would be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. NORVELL said that the public service had been suffering a long time for the want of the appropriations contained in this bill. The newspapers showed that after an animated and protracted debate of some weeks elsewhere upon the bill, it had passed, with fifteen or sixteen dissentients only. Having been subjected to a very rigid scrutiny by the immediate representatives of the people, he could not perceive any necessity for delaying its passage in this body.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he was utterly and conscientiously opposed to doing business without a quorum. He wished to ascertain if one was present.

The CHAIR, on counting, stated that there was not a quorum present.

Some members then coming in, the CHAIR announced that there was a quorum present; when

The question was taken on considering the bill now; and being decided in the affirmative, it was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole.

Mr. WRIGHT explained the objects of the amendments. The first amendment was to strike out the appropriation of $45,000, for the continuation of Clarke and Force's Documentary History of the Revolution. The object of the committee in moving to strike out this item was not to injure the publishers of this work, but to bring this matter to some definite understanding. It was time, the committee thought, for Congress to know to what extent this expense was to be carried. Besides, they thought this appropriation ought not to come in the general appropriation bill. The first thing that called his attention to this subject was, there having been sent to him some of these books, which he refused to receive. His principal object was to separate this troublesome subject from the general appropriation bill, to which it did not properly belong, and to let it rest on its own merits. Various efforts had been made by Congress to make an arrangement with those publishers so as to come to some definite understanding with regard to the extent of this work; but always without success. Mr. W. wished the Senate to take the question on this amendment first; for if the Senate should not think proper to adopt it, the committee would withdraw the other amendments, which were not deemed of sufficient importance to delay the bill.

Mr. DAVIS opposed the amendment. He understood that there was an existing law of Congress under which this appropriation was made. He considered the work as one of great value, and that would hereafter be highly appreciated. He presumed that this appropriation was for the purpose of paying arrearages now due to the publishers, and adverted to the importance of fulfilling the obligations of a contract. He did not see any particular propriety in separating this object from the general appropriation bill, and he thought that if there was any thing due on the contract, it ought to be provided for in this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT then entered into a history of the contract, and the progress that had been made in the work, stating the efforts that had been made to put a stop to it, and the refusal of the Senate to receive any of the books.

Mr. HUBBARD said the time had come when it was necessary for the Senate to resist with firmness this appropriation. He well recollected what had taken place upon this very subject—and he could not but feel somewhat surprised at the course which had been pursued by these claimants. The Senate is now asked to appropriate forty-five thousand dollars to compensate Messrs. Clarke and Force for the second volume of the Documentary History of the American Revolution, recently published by them, and for a third volume which is progress and probably to be published before the next session of Congress. It has been said on this floor that there is subsisting an abiding contract between the Government and these claimants. It has been said that that contract was entered into between them and the late Secretary of State, Mr. Livingston—and that in pursuance of that contract this amount of expenditure has arisen—and that Congress is now bound in honor and in good faith to make the appropriation. This, said Mr. H. I deny. Is there an abiding, and, for aught we know, a never-ending contract? Are these claimants at liberty to do what they please—collect such materials as may suit their convenience—publish what shall best please their taste—and claim what shall best promote their interest!—and is all this to be sanctioned under this pretended contract? Is there no supervisory power? Are we to learn from the inspection of the publication, for the first time, the character of the work? Are we to be told, when the volume shall be given to the public, that forty-five thousand dollars is required to meet the expense, and that all this is sanctioned by this pretended contract? If this be so, well indeed does that contract deserve the character which has been given to it on former occasions, by members of this Senate. He was now, as he was at the last session, opposed to this appropriation. In his judgment, it deserved to have no place in the general bill of supplies. If the claimants have a subsisting contract between them and the Government, that contract must be based upon the act of 1833 And what does that act require? Have the books been delivered agreeably to the express provisions of that act? Does the act require the State Department to estimate the amount of appropriation necessary to meet this expenditure? The act confers no such authority. Why is there not evidence here that the work has been examined and approved, and found to be in strict accordance with this alleged contract? He was aware that this appropriation had been proposed in the House as an amendment to the bill, by a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and he believed that it was done in pursuance of a decision of that committee. And can it be possible, if there was a subsisting, legal, binding contract, between the Government and the claimants, and that the sum of forty-five thousand dollars would be necessary at this time for the partial, but faithful, execution of the terms of this contract, that Congress would not have been so advised, by those charged with the execution of the laws?

There is something wrong in this matter. There is at least some misconceptions, some misgivings, in relation to this subject. The claimants cannot be ignorant of the feeling and sentiment of the Senate. It has been repeatedly discussed, and the views and the votes of the Senate have been as repeatedly made known; and before the claimants should have asked a further appropriation under this alleged contract, they were, in equity, called upon to ask of Congress an investigation into this whole business, and not to attempt to force the appropriation through, against the known and deliberate sense of the Senate. He would not be unwilling to render to them justice; but he should like to see them ready, on their part, to render justice. He had frequently examined the act of March 2, 1833, making provision for the Documentary History of the American Revolution. It was a most extraordinary act of legislation. By the terms of the act, it is true that the Secretary of State is authorized to contract with Matthew St. Clair Clarke and Peter Force, for the publication "of a work," entitled "The Documentary History of the American Revolution." It seemed to him, from the perusal of this act, that "the work" had previously been completed, and of course must have been submitted to the examination of the Secretary of State. The work, according to his version of the law, was to be printed in octavo or folio, as may be agreed upon. The expense of printing the work was fixed and determined, and the disposition of the work was to be made in the manner provided by the joint resolution of the 10th of July, 1832, for the distribution of the American State Papers. These are the material provisions of the act of Congress, under which this contract was entered into between Mr. Livingston and the claimants. Can any other view be taken of it than the one taken by himself? Is it possible that Congress, by that act, conferred upon the Secretary of State the power to make such a contract as would enable the claimants to publish what they pleased, and call it "A Documentary History of the Revolution?" Is it possible that Congress, by that act, gave to the Secretary the power to contract with these claimants to publish "the work" when they pleased? He utterly denied that such was a fair exposition of the power conferred by the act of March, 1833, upon the Secretary of State. He had also frequently examined the contract entered into between Mr. Livingston and these claimants, under date of the 19th of March, 1833. The act of Congress is correctly recited in that contract, and the contracting parties, in pursuance of the terms of the contract, had agreed that "the work" should be printed in folio, and they had fixed the rate of compensation at one cent and seven-tenths of a cent per page for each and every page of said work. But the material matter is, that there was no authority given to have any particular number of volumes printed, nor that each volume should contain any given number of pages. No such authority was conferred by the act upon the Secretary of State. In truth, the terms of that act clearly satisfy his mind that the extent of "the work" to be published must have been known at the time the contract was made. It is true that the contract contained a clause purporting to give authority to Clarke and Force "to prepare and publish fifteen hundred copies of said Documentary History of the Revolution," "according to the plan laid down in this memorial, and presented to Congress, upon which the act," as is alleged, was passed. He contended that this stipulation was unauthorized by the act itself. And it may be well to go a little further into this affair. By the terms of the act, the volumes were to be distributed in the same manner as was provided for the distribution of the American State Papers by the joint resolution of the 10th of July, 1832. He had examined that resolution; and according to its terms, the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are directed to distribute the compilation of documents directed to be published by "An act making provisions for a subscription to a compilation of Congressional documents." It will be found that that act was passed March 2, 1831, and gave authority to the Clerk of the House of Representatives to subscribe for seven hundred and fifty copies only. The joint resolution already referred to provided for the distribution of that number of copies, and of that number only. By that very resolution, after disposing of nearly two hundred copies to the Executive branch of the Government, and to the public library, it directs one copy to be given to each member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the 21st and the 22d Congress.

The act of March, 1833, directs the same distribution; but the contract entered into, as is alleged, under that act, provides for the publication of fifteen hundred copies of each volume. In his judgment, this contract was, in this respect, an entire departure from the terms of the act of Congress.

In the session of 1834, the attention of Congress was called to this matter. It will be found that, in the general appropriation bill of that year, the following provision was inserted:

"For the Documentary History of the Revolution, per act of March 2, 1833, twenty thousand dollars; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to examine the contract entered into by Edward Livingston, late Secretary of that Department, with Matthew St. Clair Clarke and Peter Force, for the collection and publication of the Documentary History of the American Revolution, and make a special report thereon at the next session of Congress, setting forth the nature and character of the materials of which the work is to be composed, and the progress made in the work; the number of volumes which will be required to complete it; and an estimate of the money which may be necessary to appropriate for the fulfilment of the contract."

The present Secretary of State made a report to Congress, and that report is to be found among the Executive documents of the second session of the Twenty-third Congress. He trusted that the Senate would well examine that report, and all subsequent proceedings, before they gave their assent to an appropriation of another dollar for the execution of that alleged contract. It so happened that this first appropriation was carried to the surplus fund, and that, in the appropriation bill of 1838, the same sum was reappropriated. But it is, he trusted, within the recollection of every Senator, that certain proceedings took place, in 1836, in the House of Representatives, with a view to the rescission of this contract.

There was another piece of history in relation to this matter, to which he must advert. At the very last session of Congress, and almost at the last hour of the session, an appropriation was inserted to complete the payment for the first volume, which had been published, and which provided that the volumes should be distributed, not in strict accordance with the joint resolution of July, 1832, but also to each member of the House of Representatives of the Twenty-third, Twenty-fourth, and Twenty-fifth Congresses. Here, then, is a recent instance of legislation of voting books, without the sanction of pre-existing law, directly into the hands of members themselves passing the vote. He desired to make no comment upon this matter. The fact was before the American people, and he trusted they would not fail to express their opinion upon such acts of their public servants. He well recollected how all this took place. This appropriation was inserted in the general bill of supplies. The House were kind enough to make a tender to the Senators of the books. The Senate amended the bill by striking out the appropriation. The House disagreed to the amendment. The Senate insisted. A committee of conference was the result; and that committee agreed on a report; and he was satisfied that that report was accepted by the Senate to save the bill. It was as follows:

"For the balance due on account of the first volume of the Documentary History of the United States, five thousand six hundred and two dollars; and the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to deliver to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, three hundred and sixty-eight copies of said work to be distributed to each of the members of the House of Representatives of the Twenty-third, Twenty-fourth, and Twenty-fifth Congresses, who are not entitled to receive the same under former resolutions of acts of Congress."

These facts must have all been familiar to the claimants. It is in the power of Congress to refuse the appropriation. This they ought to do, if, in their judgment, the contract was entered into by inadvertence, or by mistake; or if there has been any proceeding not warranted by the act itself, then it will be time for Congress to hear the memorialists and to make indemnity. But, for one, he was prepared to say that he should most reluctantly give his vote now for the bill, if it contained such an appropriation. He would not say that he should vote against it; but he hoped that the House would concur with the Senate in their proposed amendment, and that some proceeding should at once be introduced for the purpose of settling and adjusting this controversy.

Mr. BENTON said this was a continuation of the bookmaking business by Congress, which had grown up within the last eight or ten years. This was one branch, and the most important; the others, more insignificant, had been stopped; but this, the most enormous and flagrant, was continued by its own momentum. He had heretofore classed this as one of the greatest frauds ever perpetrated on our Government. Taken in every way, the manner in which it was got through without the knowledge of the most attentive members—he meant others still more than himself—the enormity of the sum involved—the vast bulk and little worth of the work—and the distribution of it to the members that voted for it—and it was truly an abominable abuse. None of us knew that such a work was authorized by us. It passed in 1833, and it was nearly a year afterwards before we discovered what we had done. He (Mr. B) found it out from Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, at the next session, who was a member of a committee who discovered what had been done; and then, for the first time, it was found out that an act had been passed by which upwards of half a million of dollars at the least, and possibly a million and a half, was to be given to an officer of the House of Representatives (M. St. C. Clarke, the Clerk of the House) and his partner, for printing a work to be given to those who voted that officer and his partner the money! As soon as found out, the abuse was resisted by some members, and has been resisted for seven years, but without effect; for while a majority condemn and denounce it, yet they are placed under duress, and compelled to vote for the money and the distribution, by putting them in the appropriation bills for the support of the Government, and then making it a question to lose the whole bill and stop the Government, or let the distribution go on. He, for one, would vote against it, and let the Government stop, if that should be the consequence, and let the people see who it was that would break up the Government before they would cease voting books to themselves! Even if the vote of the books was right in itself, it would be wrong to be put into an appropriation bill; and he would not be coerced by finding it there. But the whole practice was wrong in itself, and was becoming an enormous abuse—enormous for the amount of money—enormous for the principle—enormous for the frightful progress which it made—enormous for the consequences it might lead to. Every session we have had jobs and distributions. A multitude of works have been printed and distributed. They multiply every session. We vote the money to the jobber—the jobber gives the books to us, and many of us sell the books instanter. Twenty thousand—forty thousand—sixty thousand dollars—are a common vote, and done with a rapidity which defies all description, and in a way to escape the notice of the most attentive members. But this is a case, not of twenty—or forty—or sixty thousand dollars, but of one or two millions! It is absolutely a case of millions, and may be as many as the jobbers choose to make it. It is without limits or boundaries; it is to print whatever the jobbers choose to print—for there is no earthly control over them—under the name of Documentary History of the Revolution. Already they inform us that the private and public libraries of America and Europe are to be explored to find either manuscript or printed matter to be published, and they are at liberty to publish all that they can find. The first computation supposed it might amount to a million and a half of dollars; then the undertakers, when the enormity of that sum startled every body, proposed to put a limit on themselves by limiting the number of volumes. They proposed to limit the volumes to twenty, and left the number of pages unlimited, though estimated for at 800 pages. The pay was by the page—so much the page—and at this rate it would come to $20,400 a volume; and twenty volumes would make $408,000. This seemed to impose a limit, but it was all an illusion! The number of pages, were unlimited, and instead of 800, the first volume—the only one printed—contains above 1,000 pages! and instead of $20,400, the estimated, the actual price is $26,000! and by doubling the pages, the next one may be $52,000. This bill is to pay a balance, a balance due for the first volume; and this balance is $5,600! the estimated price of $20,400 having been previously paid. At this rate the twenty volumes will cost $520,000; but there is nothing to limit it to that amount; the publishers can print what they please, as many volumes as they please, and as many pages as they please in each volume; and being paid by the page, the bulk of the work, and the amount of the price, is absolutely without limit! It is also without limit as to time! It may last for centuries, and through generations; and the families of Mr. Clarke and Mr. Force may be pensioned on the Federal Government through successive ages. It is a personal contract with Messrs. Clarke and Force; it will descend to their representatives; it has taken six years to make one volume; and twenty volumes, even if limited to that, would require, at the same rate, one hundred and twenty years to complete the work. So slow is the forthcoming work, that we have been told on this floor—told by Mr. KING of Georgia, who began the good work of opposing this business—that he was well informed that a member had sold his interest in the whole Documentary History, for which we pay a million or so, for ten dollars in hand.

Mr. B. then took the ground that the whole contract ought to be set aside, for fraud: first, in the manner of getting it through Congress in a way to prevent all knowledge of the magnitude of the work, and that by an officer of the House; next, for want of moral or constitutional power in the Congress to vote themselves such presents; third, for the manner in which the price was fixed, and fixed nearly twice too much—as he proved, by reading answers to inquiries from the most eminent booksellers of Philadelphia and other cities, addressed to them by a committee of the House of Representatives after the discovery of the extent of the job given to Messrs. Clarke and Force. He read from the report to show that Messrs. Clarke and Force virtually fixed the price themselves by putting it into the face of the law, that they were to have at the same rate that Messrs. Blair and Rives were paid for a certain work, the price of which was fixed by Mr. Force, who was selected by Mr. Clarke and Mr. Lowry for that purpose; Clarke and Force's bill depending in Congress, while Mr. Force, as a referee, was fixing the price of work which was to govern his own.

Mr. B. finished with declaring that this book printing and book disributing business had become an enormous abuse; that the attention of the country ought to be roused up to it; and if the bill for the support of the Government was lost, it would rouse the country, and, in the end, save millions. He had been resisting this business for several years without any effect; but he should go on opposing it, opposing all these jobs, great and small. He had to encounter friends and foes, and to draw on himself censure and opposition. He regretted this, but he could not help it. The abuse must be stopped, and he had taken a fixed and inexorable resolution to try and stop it. He had put on his iron nerves, and should yield to neither friends nor foes. As for the remark that we may hazard the loss of the bill by striking out this appropriation, he considered it idle. Show me the man, said Mr. B. who is willing to stop this Government for the purpose of protecting this abominable fraud—for the purpose of voting to themselves books to be paid for by the people. We had been scared at trifles: it would not be attempted—it dared not be done; but he was ready to put his name opposite to that of any man who was willing to do it.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to—yeas 20, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, and Tallmadge—8.

The other amendments were agreed to, ordered to be engrossed, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the resolution for printing the laws relating to naturalization was taken up, considered, and agreed to.

M. NORVELL observed that the Senate was at this time very thin, and would not probably be as full as usual this week. He desired, therefore, to give notice, as the subject was an important one, that he should, with the permission of the Senate, call up for consideration the resolution which he had submitted two or three days ago in relation to the imprisonment of William Lyon Mackenzie.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, introduced a bill making further provision to prevent the abuse of the flag of the United States, and the use of unauthorized papers in the foreign slave trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. D. alluded to the necessity that existed for an early action on the bill, and gave notice that he would call call it up on to-morrow week.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the report submitted by him from the Committee on Commerce in the case of Wm. Jones, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, and with the unanimous consent of the Senate, the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840, was then ordered to be read a third time.

A motion being made that the bill should be read a third time by its title, and no objection being made, it was done accordingly.

The yeas and nays on the passage of the bill being ordered, the vote was taken and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—25.

No quorum having voted, the CHAIR announced the fact to the Senate.

Mr. SEVIER said there were a number of Senators present who had not voted; and he moved that the rules of the Senate, which required Senators who were present to vote, should be enforced. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. KNIGHT] had not voted.

Mr. KNIGHT said he knew nothing of the contents of the bill on which he was called to vote. It had not been read to the Senate, and he had not heard a word of it.

Mr. SEVIER said the question had been distinctly put to the Senate, whether the bill should be read by its title, and no Senator had objected to that course being taken. The Senator, therefore, by his silence, had given his consent. It was, however, in his power to make himself acquainted with the contents of the bill, by calling for the reading of it at any time.

The bill was then read, and the names of Messrs. KNIGHT and DIXON being called, they voted in the affirmative, and the bill was accordingly passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dixon, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—27.

NAYS—None.

Mr. HUBBARD submitted the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a joint committee be appointed for the purpose of ascertaining and examining into the facts having relation to the claim of Messrs. Clarke and Force for compiling and publishing two volumes of the Documentary History of the Revolution of the United States, under a contract (as they allege) entered into between them and Edward Livingston, late Secretary of State, with a view of putting an end to the further publication of said work at the expense of the United States; and that said committee be instructed to ascertain from said Clarke and Force, and from other sources, what sums shall be paid to indemnify them for what they have already published, under the alleged contract, and what further sum should be paid to them for any actual expense incurred in collecting materials, under said alleged contract; and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, and that they report the facts and the gross amount to both Houses of Congress with as little delay as practicable.

Mr. TAPPAN moved to amend the resolution, by adding the words, "if any thing should be found legally due."

Mr. KING hoped that his friend from Ohio would not press his amendment. He, as every Senator was aware, was utterly opposed to this contract from the beginning; he had refused to receive the volumes which had been sent to him; but he was willing to give the gentlemen concerned in it, not only what they had actually paid out, but to give them a fair compensation for collecting information in relation to the Revolutionary history of the country from Europe and elsewhere. He hoped the resolution would take the widest range, and that a liberal compensation would be made to the publishers for any expense or labor they had already incurred. He should vote for the resolution in its present shape, but he very much doubted if it would do any good if the opinion was expressed that there was no legal obligation on Congress to make any further payments.

Mr. TAPPAN said if there was no legal obligation on Congress, he should not vote for paying any thing. The work commenced in a fraud, and was carried on by men legislating to get themselves libraries out of the public Treasury. This was a fraud on the Treasury, and these publishers knew it at the time the act was passed, as well as he did. They knew that the Constitution gave members of Congress no right to supply themselves with books at the public expense, and, therefore, in carrying on this work, they did it with their eyes open, at their own risk. If there was any thing due these men in point of law, he was willing to pay for it; but he could not agree to the principle advanced by his friend from Alabama, that they were bound to pay, because there had been a combination to cheat the Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that he was as anxious to get clear of this contract as any other man; but at the same time he was anxious that Congress should get clear of it by doing what he conceived to be justice and equity on their part. Now, it could not be denied, because the recorded evidence was before them, that this contract was entered into with these individuals under an express act of Congress; and it was too late now for them to say, with the honorable Senator from Ohio, that the Congress of the United States had no right to pass such a law. He should not enter into the constitutional question, but it certainly would not be fair, after the expense had been actually incurred by these individuals under the contract, to refuse payment upon the plea, whether well or ill founded, that we had no right to authorize the Secretary of State to make such a contract. In this case he had no doubt that Mr. Livingston altogether misapprehended the extent of the obligation he was incurring, and indeed he presumed that no member of Congress, at the time, had any idea that the contract would ever involve any thing like the amount of expense that they now saw it would. Nevertheless, they had got themselves into the difficulty, and how they were to get out of it was the question? By raising a legal question? No; but by pursuing the course that had been pointed out by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Alabama.

Let us (continued Mr. B.) pay them fairly—let us give them a just indemnity for the expenses they have incurred and the labor they have performed. He would not go to the extent of the profits they might imagined themselves entitled to, but he was for giving them a fair and even liberal indemnity For his own part he had felt rather inclined, as they would eventually be bound to pay for the two volumes already published and the one now in progress, to let the appropriation pass as it stood in the bill, if such had been the pleasure of the Senate. The work had been done under a law which is still in existence, and it would be in vain for them to say that Congress had no right to pass the law. Mr. B. concluded by saying that he was for paying for what had been done and getting rid of the contract.

Mr. SEVIER would prefer that the resolution should be amended so as to make it a resolution of the Senate simply; and then there would be a chance of doing something in the premises; but even if passed here in its present shape, there would be but little probability of its being acted on by the House.

Mr. HUBBARD said, then the responsibility would rest with that body, but the joint action of the two Houses was necessary to do any thing efficient on this subject.

After some further remarks from Messrs. TAPPAN, SEVIER, and PRENTISS,

The resolution was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and then Adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, May 7, 1840.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the State of Rhode Island, praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion by Mr. DIXON, it was ordered that the memorial of Burrington Anthony, presented on the 4th instant, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial of the corporation of Alexandria, praying an amendment to the charter of that town; [that the Mayor thereof be elected by the people;] which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred

The petition of Richard Harris, and

The petition of Jonathan Nye, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the House bill for the relief of R. K. Call, reported in favor of its indefinite postponement. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Preston Starrett, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR submitted a message from the President of the United States, in compliance in part with a resolution of the Senate in relation to the bonds issued by the Territory of Florida; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 24th April, which was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
May 4, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to submit this report, in compliance with the following resolution, passed by the Senate on the 24th ult.:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to the Senate the aggregate amount of all expenditures or payments of every kind from the Treasury in each year, from 1824 to 1839, inclusive, in one column, and in another column for each year the aggregate amount, independent of the payments on account of the public debt, whether funded or unfunded, and in a third column, the aggregate amount for permanent and ordinary purposes, excluding payments on account of objects either extraordinary or temporary; such as the public debt, trust funds and indemnities, claims of States for war debts or 3 per cents on lands sold, occasional donations in money to objects in the District of Columbia or otherwise, survey of the coast, taking the census, duties refunded, the Exploring expedition, and materials collected for the gradual improvement of the navy, durable public buildings of all kinds, bridges and fortifications, all roads, canals, breakwaters, and improvements in rivers and harbors, arming militia and forts, all pensions except those to invalids, and the purchases of title to lands from Indians, the removal of Indians, and their wars, with such other payments as may have been made in those years for property lost or injuries committed during any hostilities."

The resolution was on the same day referred to the Register of the Treasury, with instructions to prepare a tabular statement, containing the information desired in three separate columns. It is hereto annexed, marked A.

He was requested, also, to prepare another statement, showing the specific sum which had been deducted each year on account of each item mentioned in the resolution as either extraordinary or temporary.

Believing that this would be highly useful, as showing the details on which the general results in the third column of the first statement rest, and as embracing many statistical facts, possessing in themselves much interest, I have annexed it, marked B.

Unless some accidental omission or other error has occurred, these two statements will present all the information desired by the resolution.

With high respect,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To Hon. RICH. M. JOHNSON,
Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

T. L. SMITH, Register.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Register's Office, May 4, 1840.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the letter of the Secretary, and the tables, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. then rose to make another motion, and that was, to print an extra number of these papers. He proposed to give his reasons for the motion, and for that purpose, asked that the papers should be sent to him, (which was done;) and Mr. B. went on to say that his object was to spread before the country, in an authentic form, the full view of all the Government expenses for a series of years past, going back as far as Mr. Monroe's administration; and thereby enabling every citizen, in every part of the country, to see the actual, the comparative, and the classified expenditures of the Government for the whole period. This proceeding had become necessary, Mr. B. said, from the systematic efforts made for some years past, to impress the country with the belief that the expenditures had increased threefold in the last twelve years—that they had risen from THIRTEEN to THIRTY-NINE millions of dollars; and that this enormous increase was the effect of the extravagance, of the corruption, and of the incompetency of the Administrations which had succeeded that of Mr. Adams and Mr. Monroe. These two latter Administrations were held up as the models of economy; those of Mr. Van Buren and General Jackson were stigmatized as monsters of extravagance; and tables of figures were so arrranged as to give color to the characters attributed to each. These systematic efforts—this reiterated assertion, made on this floor, of thirteen millions increased to thirty-nine—and the effect which such statements must have upon the minds of those who cannot see the purposes for which the money was expended, appeared to him (Mr. B.) to require some more formal and authentic refutation than any one individual could give—something more imposing than the speech of a solitary member could afford. Familiar with the action of the Government for twenty years past—coming into the Senate in the time of Mr. Monroe—remaining in it ever since—a friend to economy in public and in private life—and closely scrutinizing the expenditures of the Government during the whole time—he (Mr. B.) felt himself to be very able at any time to have risen in his place, and to have exposed the delusion of this thirteen and thirty-nine million bugbear; and, if he did not do so, it was because, in the first place, he was disinclined to bandy contradictions on the floor of the Senate; and, in the second place, because he relied upon the intelligence of the country to set all right whenever they obtained a view of the facts. This view he had made himself the instrument of procuring, and the Secretary of the Treasury had now presented it. It was ready for the contemplation of the American people; and he could wish every citizen to have the picture in his own hands, that he might contemplate it at his own fireside, and at his full leisure. He could wish every citizen to possess a copy of this report, now received from the Secretary of the Treasury, under the call of the Senate, and printed by its order; he could wish every citizen to possess one of these authentic copies, bearing the imprimatur of the American Senate; but that was impossible; and, limiting his action to what was possible, he would propose to print such number of extra copies as would enable some to reach every quarter of the Union. He knew that the report could easily go through the newspapers, (for it was very short,) and he hoped that it would appear in every paper that was a friend to truth and to fair dealing—that wished to give correct information to its readers. He hoped it would appear in all such papers; but that was not sufficient. The newspaper publications were not sufficiently free from cavil to answer his purpose; no publication could be sufficient but the one made by the order of the Senate; and, therefore, he wished the document itself to go forth, with the Senatorial imprimatur upon it, in sufficient numbers to reach every quarter of the Union. He wished a large number to be printed; but would not suggest any particular number until he had first given to the Senate some view of the papers themselves, and thus shown them to be worthy of the most ample multiplication, and of the most extensive diffusion.

Mr. B. then opened the tables, and explained their character and contents. The first one (marked A) consisted of three columns, and exhibited the aggregate, and the classified expenditures of the Government from the year 1824 to 1839, inclusive; the second one (marked B) contained the detailed statement of the payments annually made on account of all temporary or extraordinary objects, including the public debt, for the same period. The second table was explanatory of the third column of the first one; and the two, taken together, would enable every citizen to see the actual expenditures, and the comparative expenditures, of the Government for the whole period which he had mentioned.

Mr. B. then examined the actual and the comparative expenses of two of the years, taken from the two contrasted periods referred to, and invoked the attention of the Senate to the results which the comparison would exhibit. He took the first and the last of the years mentioned in the tables—the years 1824 and 1839—and began with the first item in the first column. This showed the aggregate expenditures for every object for the year 1824, to have been $31,898,538 47—very near thirty-two millions of dollars, said Mr. B. and if stated alone, and without explanation, very capable of astonishing the public, of imposing upon the ignorant, and of raising a cry against the dreadful extravagance, the corruption, and the wickedness of Mr. Monroe's administration. Taken by itself, (and indisputably true it is in itself,) and this aggregate of near thirty-two millions is very sufficient to effect all this surprise and indignation in the public mind; but, passing on to the second column to see what were the expenditures, independent of the public debt, and this large aggregate will be found to be reduced more than one half; it sinks to $15,330,144 71. This is a heavy deduction; but it is not all. Passing on to the third column, and it is seen that the actual expenses of the Government for permanent and ordinary objects, independent of the temporary and extraordinary ones, for this same year, were only $7,107,892 05; being less than the one-fourth part of the aggregate of near thirty-two millions. This looks quite reasonable, and goes far towards relieving Mr. Monroe's administration from the imputation to which a view of the aggregate expenditure for the year would have subjected it. But, to make it entirely satisfactory, and to enable every citizen to understand the important point of the Government expenditures—a point on which the citizens of a free and representative Government should be always well informed—to attain this full satisfaction, let us pass on to the second table (marked B) and fix our eyes on its first column, under the year 1824 We shall there find every temporary and extraordinary object, and the amount paid on account of it, the deduction of which reduced an aggregate of near thirty-two millions to a fraction over seven millions. We shall there find the explanation of the difference between the first and third columns. The first item is the sum of $16 568,393 76, paid on account of the principal and interest of the public debt. The second is the sum of $4,891,386 56, paid to merchants for indemnities under the treaty with Spain of 1819, by which we acquired Florida. The third is $5,510 27 paid to States for claims on account of war debts. The fourth is $47,714 53 for the three per centum to the new States on the lands sold within their limits. The fifth is $17,000 on account of the two per centum to the Cumberland road. The fifth is $4,373 19 for the survey of the coast. The sixth is $423,342 46 for collecting materials for the gradual increase of the navy, and the improvement of the navy yards. The seventh is $180,309 67 for durable public buildings. The eighth is $429,972 04 for bridges and fortifications. The ninth is $56,955 99 for roads, canals, and breakwaters, and improvements in rivers and harbors, except the Cumberland road, which was stated by itself. The tenth is $171,155 43 for providing arms for the militia of the United States, and for arming the fortifications. The eleventh is $1,267,600 41, for all pensions, except those of invalids. The twelfth is $429,987 90 for purchasing land from Indians, and paying for Indian depredations. The thirteenth, and last item, is the sum of $296,960 21 for miscellaneous objects, and for property lost, or injuries committed, during hostilities with any power. The total of all these items, except the public debt, is $8,222,252 66. This total, added to the sum paid on account of the public debt, makes close upon twenty-five millions of dollars; and this, deducted from the aggregate of near thirty-two millions, leaves a fraction over seven millions for the real expenses of the Government—the ordinary and permanent expenses—during the last year of Mr. Monroe's administration. This is certainly a satisfactory result. It exempts the Administration of that period from the imputation of extravagance, which the unexplained exhibition of the aggregate expenditures might have drawn upon it in the minds of uninformed persons. It clears that Administration from all blame. It must be satisfactory to every candid mind. And now let us apply the test of the same examination to some year of the present Administration, now so incontinently charged with ruinous extravagance. Let us see how the same rule will work when applied to the present period; and, for that purpose, let us take the last year in the table, that of 1839. Let others take any year that they please, or as many as they please: I take one, because I only propose to give an example; and I take the last one in the table, because it is the last. Let us proceed with this examination, and see what the results, actual and comparative, will be.

Commencing with the aggregate payments from the Treasury for all objects, Mr. B. said it would be seen at the foot of the first column in the first table, that they amounted to $37,129,396 80; passing to the second column, and it would be seen that this sum was reduced to $25,982,797 75; and passing to the third, and it would be seen that this latter sum was itself reduced to $13,525,800 18; and, referring to the second table, under the year 1839, and it would be seen how this aggregate of thirty-seven millions was reduced to thirteen and a half. It was a great reduction; a reduction of nearly two-thirds from the aggregate amount paid out; and left for the proper expenses of the Government—its ordinary and permanent expenses—an inconceivably small sum for a great nation of seventeen millions of souls, covering an immense extent of territory, and acting a part among the great powers of the world. To trace this reduction—to show the reasons of the difference between the first and the third columns, Mr. B. would follow the same process which he had pursued in explaining the expenditures of the year 1824, and ask for nothing in one case which had not been granted in the other.

1. The first item to be deducted from the thirty-seven million aggregate, was the sum of $11,146,599 05 paid on account of the public debt. He repeated, on account of the public debt; for it was paid in redemption of Treasury notes; and these Treasury notes were so much debt incurred to supply the place of the revenue deposited with the States, in 1836, or shut up in banks during the suspension of 1837, or due from merchants, to whom indulgence had been granted. To supply the place of these unattainable funds, the Government went in debt by issuing Treasury notes; but faithful to the sentiment which abhorred a national debt, it paid off the debt almost as fast as it contracted it. Above eleven millions of this debt was paid in 1839, amounting to almost the one third part of the aggregate expenditure of that year; and thus, nearly the one third part of the sum which is charged upon the Administration as extravagance and corruption, was a mere payment of debt!—a mere payment of Treasury notes which we had issued to supply the place of our misplaced revenue. This item being deducted from the 37 millions, reduces it to 26.

2. The second item to be deducted is stated in the table under the description of trust funds; and consists of moneys received in trust for the Chicasaw Indians, and other Indians, on the sale of their lands, for which the United States act as their agent and treasurer. It amounts to near a quarter of a million, to wit, $240,694 for the year 1839; but for the three preceding years averaged a million and a quarter, and contributed largely to swell the expenditures, as they were termed, of 1836, 1837, and 1838. This item had no existence in the year 1824; so that it becomes a new charge, apparently, upon the Treasury; but in reality no charge at all, as it was only delivering over to Indians the money which had been received for them, and belonged to them. Yet this item, amounting to nearly four millions in the last four years, is set down to the reckless extravagance of a mad and ruinous Administration.

3. The third item to be deducted is the sum of $717,552 27, for indemnities; that is to say, for moneys recovered from foreign nations, under Gen. Jackson's administration, for merchants who had been plundered under previous Administrations—whose money, when received, had gone into our Treasury, and was afterwards paid out to the rightful owners as their respective rights were ascertained. The payment for 1839 was near three quarters of a million; but for the three previous years they amounted in the whole to about five and a half millions; and, according to the accusation of the Opposition gentlemen, constituted so much of the horrid extravagance of those years! and here let us mark the difference between the present times and those of 1824. When, in that year, the sum of near five millions was paid out of the Treasury for indemnities to merchants under the Florida treaty, no one ever thought of making the people believe that it was a part of the expenses of the Government. No one ever thought of injuring the Administration about it. These conceptions have been reserved for the present day. Now, for the first time in the history of our country, or perhaps of any country, the recovery of indemnities from foreigners, and their payment to our own citizens, becomes a dreadful extravagance—a ruinous waste of money—for which a mad and profligate Administration must be thrust from power!

4. The fourth item is a small sum of $4,875 50 for claims of States on account of expenditures for the general benefit during the late war. It was a payment of debt, and not an expense of Government, and though small in 1839, it had been considerable in the three preceding years, amounting in that time to about $230,000; and, of course, swelling by that much the aggregate expenditures of those years, and helping to make up the monstrous extravagance of which the country heard so much.

5. The next item grows out of the three per centum fund to the new States on the amount of the lands sold within their limits. It is due to the States by compact, as a consideration, and a most inadequate one it is, for not taxing the Federal lands. For the year 1839, this item amounted to $63,670; and, being a debt due to the States, is no part of the Government expenses. For the three previous years, when the land sales were at the largest, and when some of the States had neglected for some years to draw their money, the payments on this account amounted to near one and a half millions of dollars; and, of course, swelled to that amount the extravagance of 1836, '37, and '38! In the year 1824, this item was only $47,714.

6. The sixth item to be deducted was nearly allied to the former. It was $198,530 for the two per centum on the sales of the public lands to make roads to the new States, and applicable to the Cumberland road. In the year 1824 it was only $17 000; but in the great sales of 1835, '6, and '7, it amounted to near $1,200,000. Here again was a payment of a debt converted into wasteful extravagance!

7. Donations of money to, or payments on account of, the District of Columbia, was the seventh item of deduction which Mr. B. mentioned. It amounted to $126,374 for the year 1839. It was a new item in the list of Government payments, having no existence in 1824, nor until the year 1832. After that time it had been annual, and as high as $313,000 in one year, to wit, 1833, and for the years 1836, '7, and '8, amounted to near $440,000. It was a gratuity to the District, which had no political rights; and it was a gratuity which had no other object than to relieve it from burthens improvidently contracted; yet received the usual character of corrupt extravagance.

8. The survey of the coast was the eighth item which Mr. B. explained. It was a temporary and extraordinary object, which had grown up from a trifle to a large amount within a few years past, and amounted to $91,995 for the year 1839. Previous to General Jackson's administration it rarely exceeded two thousand dollars per annum; for the years 1836–7 and 8, it amounted to about $220,000.

9. Duties refunded to merchants was another of the new and large items which had lately grown up among our Treasury payments. From 1824 to 1832, it was unknown; yet in 1839, it was $179,304; in the year 1833, it was $701,000, and for 1836–7, and 8, it amounted to above $800,000. This was a favor, or an act of justice to merchants, granted by acts of Congress, or by judicial decisions, or by reversal of previous constructions of the laws. It is no part of the Government expenditure, though, being refunded from the Treasury, it goes into the enumeration to swell the general aggregate—to swell the cry of extravagance—and to prove the hostility of the Administration to merchants!

10. A tenth item to be deducted was the sum of $714,857 for collecting materials for the increase of the navy. This was an expenditure for the future defence of the country, and averaged about $800,000 per annum since the commencement of General Jackson's administration, though only $423,000 in 1824. It is clearly no part of the expenses of Government, but an outlay of money for the benefit of after years, and of posterity.

11. Permanent public buildings is another of the large items of recent expenditure. Formerly these buildings were of perishable materials, and sunk under the decay of time, or the ravages of fire; for some years past durable materials had been selected, and fireproof edifices constructed. The expenditure for this purpose in 1839, was $1,248,044, and near the same for the three preceeding years. This again was an expenditure for the benefit of posterity, and not chargeable as an expense upon the actual administrations.

12. The sum of $735,570 for bridges and fortifications, was the twelfth item which Mr. B. pointed out for deduction, being both of them expenditures for the benefit of posterity; the expenditure extraordinary and temporary, but the benefit general and permanent.

13. The sum of $1,491,000 for the improvement of rivers, harbors, and roads, exclusive of the Cumberland road, was another expenditure of the same character. In 1824, it was but $56,955; but took a start then which would have known no bounds had it not been for the Maysville veto.

14. Providing arms for the militia of the States and cannon for the forts is another expenditure for future times and for posterity. It amounted to $474,906 for 1839, and averaged above half a million a year for each of the three preceding years. In 1824, it was but $171,155.

15. Pensions, except those to invalids, was the next item noted by Mr. B. for deduction. They were gratuities from the Treasury, and not an expense of Government. They amounted in 1839 to $3,033,764, being near three times what they were in 1824. They had been an enormous drain upon the Treasury for the last seven years, amounting in 1833 to $4,485,000, and subsequently averaging about half that sum.

16. Purchase of lands from Indians was another large item to be deducted, and which had vastly increased of late. In 1824, this head of expenditure only amounted to $429,987; in 1839 it was $1,708,123; in 1836 was as high as three millions. in 1837, $2,484,000; and in 1838, it was $4,603,518; These were heavy expenditures, incurred for the great object of relieving all the States from the incumbrance of an Indian population; but though heavy, it is not money gone from the Treasury never to return to it. It all returns, and with profit, in the sale of the lands acquired; yet the vast sums paid on this head, is cited against us as ruinous extravagance, for which the Goths should be driven from the Capitol!

17. Removal of Indians and their wars was another item nearly connected with the last, and subject to the same remarks. It had grown up of late, and was directed to the good of the States. In 1824 it was nothing; in 1839 it was $1,775,914. In the three preceding years it was, respectively, in round numbers, $6,000,000, $6,500,000, and $5,500,000. This is one of the largest heads of increased expenditure in recent years, and one of the most indispensable for the States of the South and West. It is appurtenant to the purchase of the Indian lands; and, although large, yet the sales of the lands will far more than reimburse it.

18. And, finally, Mr. B. noted the sum of $232,369 for miscellaneous objects, not reduceable to a precise head, which swelled the list of expenditures, without belonging to the expenses of the Government.

19. The Exploring Expedition was the last of the items. It was of recent origin, amounting to $97,968 in 1839, and to about $560,000 for the three preceding years.

These are the eighteen heads of extraordinary expenditure, said Mr. B. and the amount expended for each; and now let gentlemen of the Opposition say for which of these they did not vote, to which they now object, and for which they will not vote again at this session?

With this view of the tabular statements Mr. B. closed the examination of the items of expenditure, and stated the results to be a reduction of the 37 million aggregate in 1839, like that of the 32 million aggregate in 1824, to about one-third of its amount. The very first item, that of the payment of public debt in the redemption of Treasury notes, reduced it 11 millions of dollars: it sunk it from 37 millions to 26. The other eighteen items amounted to $12,656,977, and reduced the 26 millions to 13½. Here then is a result which is attained by the same process which applies to the year 1824, and to every other year, and which is right in itself; and which must put to flight and to shame all the attempts to excite the country with this bugbear story of extravagance. In the first place the aggregate expenditures have not increased threefold in fifteen years; they have not risen from 13 to 39 millions, as incontinently asserted by the Opposition; but from 32 millions to 37 or 39. And how have they risen? By paying last year 11 millions for Treasury notes, and more than 12 millions for Indian lands, and wars, removals of Indians, and increase of the army and navy, and other items as enumerated. The result is a residuum of 13½ millions for the real expenses of the Government; a sum 1½ millions short of what gentlemen proclaim would be an economical expenditure. They all say that 15 millions would be an economical expenditure: very well! here is 13½! which is a million and a half short of that mark.

The authentic tables show that the aggregate expenditures for 1824, came within five millions of those of 1839; consequently that, without a deduction for extraordinary expenditures, the charge of extravagance, waste, ruin, profligacy, &c. might have been raised against the Administration of that day, and some uninformed persons excited against it by a groundless clamor; yet no one thought of raising such a clamor in 1824. No one then thought of charging, as extravagance, payments on account of the public debt, and for indemities to merchants, and other extraordinary expenses. Then all parties made the proper deductions for payments either temporary or extraordinary in their nature. No one sought to mystify or to impose upon the ignorant. No one thought of palming a story of thirty-two millions upon the country as the expenses of the country. All that has been reserved for the present times; it has been reserved for our day; and may have been attended for a while with the ephemeral success which crowns for a moment the petty arts of delusion practised upon the ignorant. But the day for this delusion has gone by. The classified tables, now presented, will reach every citizen, and will clear up every doubt. They will enable every citizen to see every item of expenditure—to judge it himself—and to demand of the Opposition gentlemen, if they did not vote for it themselves, and if they now object to it? Taking the extraordinary items as they rise, and beginning with the first, the sum of eleven millions paid for redemption of Treasury notes; and it can be demanded if that payment was not right? and so on through the whole list, amounting to twelve and a half millions. The ordinary and permanent expenses, amounting to thirteen and a half millions, no one objects to: all admit that that sum is a million and a half within the mark of meritorious economy. It is on the extraordinaries—it is on the difference between thirteen and a half and thirty-seven millions—that the attack is made; and now we produce these extraordinaries. We give a list of them, item by item, with the amount paid on account of each; and call upon the gentlemen of the Opposition to name the one to which they object? to name the one for which they did not vote? This is what we do; and I will tell you, Mr. President, what they will do: they will not name one item to which they now object, or against which they voted! They will not name one; and the reason is, because they cannot! They voted for all—they approve all—the country will approve all, except part for pensions and harbors, and of these the Opposition were the leading advocates. And thus these gentlemen of the Opposition are presented in the extraordinary light of going abroad to make a general denunciation of the Administration for extravagant expenditure; and when we show them the bill of particulars, and ask of them to point out the extravagant items, or the ones for which they did not vote, they will remain silent! They will name no item, because they cannot.

Mr. B. said that this Administration, and that of General Jackson, were ready for a comparison with any that preceded them. Aggregates against aggregates, or items against items, they were ready for the comparison. If any one shall say that the expenses of the Government were thirty seven millions in 1839, or thirty-nine millions in 1838, we answer that this is only five or seven millions more than the aggregate of 1824; that the aggregate was then thirty-two millions, and the increase is only in proportion to the increase of the country. If, descending from aggregates and going into items, it is said that sixteen millions must be deducted from the aggregate of 1824 for payments to the public debt, and eight millions more for indemnities and other extraordinaries, we answer that eleven millions must be deducted from the aggregate of 1839 for redemption of Treasury notes, and twelve and a half millions more for Indian wars, treaties, and removals, and a dozen other extraordinaries. This brings the thirty-seven down to thirteen and a half; and at that point complaint ceases.

Mr. B. said that the tables which were presented treated every Administration alike. Beginning in the last year of Mr. Monroe, they came down through the term of Mr. Adams, and the two terms of General Jackson, and the three years which had elapsed under Mr. Van Buren. All were treated alike. The same rule was applied to the expenditures under each one. The aggregate was given in every case first; and then the extraordinary, separated from the ordinary expenditures, and the same items charged and credited in every case. In looking at the aggregates, it will be seen that every Administration needed this classification; that the aggregate under Mr. Adams's administration was not thirteen millions, as repeated so many millions of times, but about the double of that! and that this thirteen millions for that gentleman's administration was only attained by deducting extraordinaries! by going through the very process which reduces the expenditure under Mr. Van Buren to thirteen and a half millions. The smallest aggregate in the whole table is that of 1835, under Gen. Jackson's administration, when the public debt had ceased, and the Indian wars had not begun. The aggregate for that year is seventeen millions and a half Even including the extraordinaries of that year, and the aggregate was but seventeen millions and a half! And so it will be again. As soon as we are done paying the Treasury notes, which are issued in lieu of our misplaced revenue, and so soon as our Indian troubles are over, and the payments completed for removal of Indians, and purchase of their lands, the aggregate expenditures will come down to about what they were in 1835; and the ordinary expenses will be within fifteen millions.

Mr. B. demanded who ever deemed it an expense of the Government, when Mr. Jefferson purchased Louisiana at fifteen millions of dollars? And who could think of charging as an expense the large sums which had been lately paid in extinguishing Indian titles, and in removing Indians? One would as soon think of charging, among the expenses of a family, the outlay which should be made by a prudent and thrifty farmer in purchasing additional land, and inclosing it with fences, or covering it with improvements. The extinction of the Indian titles—the acquisition of their lands for settlement and cultivation—and the removal of the Indians themselves from all the States, was one of the great measures which illustrated General Jackson's administration, and was beneficial both to the Indians and to the States. So great an object could not be effected without a large expenditure of money; and who is there now to stand up and condemn the Administration for this expenditure? Who wants these Indians back? Who wants Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and all the other States, again incumbered with the Indians which have left them?

That the expenses of the Government had increased in the last twelve or fifteen years, Mr. B. said was just as certainly true as it was naturally to have been expected. The country itself had increased in that time: several new States had been admitted into the Union, and several new Territories had been created. An additional impetus had been given to the public defences in the increase of the army and navy—wars with several Indian tribes had intervened—vast purchases of Indian lands had been effected—whole tribes, nay, whole nations of Indians, had been removed, and removed to a vast distance, and at a vast expense. This latter expenditure was chiefly for the benefit of the South and West; but where is the man in any quarter of the Union that can stand up and condemn it?

Sir, I admit an increased expenditure; and, far from concealing, I exhibit and proclaim it. I display the items; they are spread out in the statements now under discussion; I point them out to the country. I say they will be found, principally, in the navy—in the army—in the Indian department—in the pensions—in the light-house establishment—in Indian wars—in the defence of the frontiers, North and West—in fortifications—in preparing arms and munitions of war—in the legislative department—in permanent and durable fire proof public buildings—and in assuming the foreign debt, and making other expenditures for the District of Columbia. In these branches of the service will the increases be principally found, and I supported them all except the increase for pensions, harbors, some of the light-houses, and the book printing part of the legislative expenses. I supported all except these: but the gentlemen of the Opposition supported all that I did, and these besides; and now go forth to raise a cry of extravagance!

Mr. B. said the Opposition not only voted for these increased expenditures, but in some instances greatly augmented them This was the case in the Indian expenditures, and especially among the Cherokees. The Opposition sat themselves up for the guardians of these Indians: they seemed to make political alliance with them. The Indians became parties to our politics: the Opposition became allies to them; and the result was double trouble, and double expense, and double delays, and double vexation of every kind with those Indians; until it required a military force to compel them to comply with treaties which gave them millions more than they ought to have received!

The Opposition not only voted for all the increases, and caused some of them to be augmented, but they attempted many enormous expenditures which the Democratic members opposed and prevented. Let any one look to the bills which were rejected, either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; let any one look to the number of these bills, and the tens of millions, in the aggregate, with which they were freighted, and then say what the expenses would have been if the Opposition had been in power. One of these bills alone, the French spoliation bill, was for five millions of dollars; others were for vast sums, especially the harbor bills. They were rejected by the votes of Democratic members; and if they had not been—if they had passed—they would have swelled the thirty-seven to near fifty millions; and would have been charged upon us as reckless, wasteful, horrible extravagance.

Mr. B. said that financial statements were a difficult subject to handle—hard for a speaker to understand himself, and harder still to make himself be understood by others. It was a point at which the most unfounded impressions might be made on the public mind—on which the greatest errors might be propagated. Yet it was a point on which correct information should be disseminated—on which every citizen should be informed—which every one should make it his business to understand. Economy should be the cardinal virtue of a free Government, and the whole body of the citizens should be the guardians of that virtue. They should guard the national finances; and for that purpose should understand them. They should know how much money was raised, for what purpose, and how expended. They could not be too jealous of the misapplication of the public moneys; they could not scrutinize too closely the public accounts. Those accounst could not be too often presented to them, nor in a form too simple and obvious. It has been m endeavor, said Mr. B. both in calling for the statements which had just come in from the Treasury, and in what I have said upon them, to present the difficult subject of our finances in a plain, obvious, and intelligible form. My object has been to elucidate, and not to mystify—to enlighten, and not to confuse. I have endeavored to present a full, plain, and authentic statement of the public expenditures; such as every citizen can see and comprehend. Our adversaries present an aggregate—rush at the passions, and endeavor to alarm, or to enrage, the people. I present the particulars, and ask for their deliberate judgment. Sir, I have confidence in the capacity of my countrymen. I have confidence in their capacity for self-government; in their moral and intellectual capacity for governing themselves—for sustaining and carrying on the frame of Government which our ancestors provided for us. I believe that my fellow citizens possess the requisite qualities for self-government—judgment to understand—virtue to choose—and patriotism to sustain—the principles and the measures which are best for themselves. I do not believe in the monarchical idea, that the people are ignorant, venal, factious; that they have no enlightened views of men or measures; that reason, truth, and sound argument, are lost upon them, as pearls thrown to the swine; that the only way to govern them is to bamboozle and debauch them. I believe in none of these monarchical opinions, and have never practised upon them. I have never addressed myself to the supposed ignorance, venality, faction, or caprice of my countrymen, but always to their intelligence, virtue, and patriotism. The argumentum ad ignorantiam has had no place in my speeches: the argumentum ad judicium has been my aim. I cannot say that I have spoken with judgment; but I can affirm that I have always paid my countrymen the compliment of speaking to their accredited judgment—never to their supposed folly. I have spoken to the rational minds, to the virtuous hearts, and to the lofty, generous, and patriotic feelings of my countrymen; and I am too well content with the effect which this plan of speaking has had, to change it now. Facts, and reasons, are my materials—simplicity my style. Away with exordium—away with peroration—away with holyday phrases—away with theatrical display—away with all figures, but figures of arithmetic; and of these I give many, and never more than in this short speech. This has been my plan of speaking, and this it is now. I have procured plain statements to be made out, and have delivered a plain speech upon them. I have endeavored to make myself intelligible on a subject in which intelligibility is somewhat difficult—on which it is easy for the speaker to get both himself and his hearers into a fog. I have aimed at perspicuity, and flatter myself that I have been understood. I wish the country to judge the expenditures of the Government—the particulars as well as the aggregate—and therefore place the whole before the public. Our adversaries attack the aggregate: Let them examine the particulars, and name the one to which they object, and for which they did not vote!

Mr. B. then appealed to Senators of the Democratic party to name the number of extra copies of the report which they would propose to print, professing himself ready to agree to any number that was satisfactory to his friends.

Mr. HUBBARD proposed thirty thousand.

Mr. BENTON accepted the proposition, and moved that thirty thousand extra copies of the report be printed for the use of the Senate.

This motion gave rise to a very interesting and animated discussion, in which Messrs. BROWN, HUBBARD, CALHOUN, and BUCHANAN, advocated, and Messrs. PRESTON, SOUTHARD, CLAY, of Kentucky, and WEBSTER, opposed the motion, and a sketch of which will be given at an early day.

The question being then on printing thirty thousand extra copies of the report, it was agreed to—yeas 22, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smigeon, Wall, Williams, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Knight, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—14.

The Senate then adjorned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, May 7, 1840.

Pursuant to adjournment, the House of Representatives re-assembled this day, at 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the report of the select committee appointed to investigate the facts relative to the recent breach of privilege on the floor of the House.

Mr. ADAMS reminded the House that this was the day set apart for the consideration of the bill numbered 100, heretofore reported by him from the Committee on Manufactures, entitled "A bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports."

Mr. A. said it appeared doubtful whether any use or benefit would arise from the consideration of the report of the select committee on the question of privilege; and, in his opinion, the best way to dispose of it was to get rid of it at once. He moved, therefore, to lay it on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would modify his motion so as to postpone the consideration of the report to a future day.

Mr. ADAMS thereupon moved that the further consideration of the report be postponed until Thursday next; which motion prevailed.

And the further consideration of the report was postponed accordingly.

Mr. ADAMS then moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill above mentioned; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON intimated that the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Goverment, for the year 1840, had undergone some amendments in the Senate. Two of these were mere amendments of form; the third might give rise to a little debate. He thought, however, that they might all be disposed of in a short space of time, all of them being of such a nature as not to require commitment. He hoped, therefore, that when the bill was sent from the Senate the House would take it up and dispose of the amendments at once.

Mr. ADAMS intimated that one of the amendments was of a character which, at a former session, had given rise to some difference of opinion between the two Houses, the result of which had been the appointment of a Committee of Conference. He would desire that question to be disposed of with a full House. He hoped that the House would go into committee on the bill indicated by him; and, when the House was more full, the amendments in the other bill might be taken up and disposed of.

The suggestions on both sides were acceeded to.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, who had for some time past been detained from the House by indisposition, asked that the House, the same cause continuing, would relieve him from further service on the Committee on Military Affairs.

And Mr. J. was excused accordingly.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. A. DICKINS, their Secretary, setting forth that the Senate had passed the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840, with certain amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

On leave given, Mr. CARTER presented certain additional testimony; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BELL of Tennessee in the chair) on the "bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports."

Mr. A. asked that, before the reading of the bill, one of the petitions on which it was founded might be read. The sections of the bill were accommodated to the prayer of the petitioners. There were as many as fifty petitions coming from all the manufacturing States of the Union, setting forth the difficulties that existed in the collection of the revenue. The object of the bill was to remedy these inconveniences, and to ensure the collection of the revenue.

One of the petitions was accordingly read by the CLERK.

After which, the bill, having been first read through, was taken up by sections. And the first section being under consideration—

Mr. RHETT said that this bill had been reported some time since, and that there had been laid on the table a number of amendments thereto; say from 15 to 20. If these amendments had covered the objections which he entertained against the bill, he would have had nothing to say, but would have let the sense of the committee be taken upon them, and the bill be passed, if the House so determined.

The CHAIR inquired of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] whether he proposed to amend the first section of the bill?

Mr. RHETT said he was opposed to the whole bill.

The CHAIR said the gentleman could then state his objections to the bill after the sections had been gone through with in order.

Mr. RHETT moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Manufactures.

The CHAIR said the motion was not in order.

Mr. RHETT thereupon moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. In support of this motion, Mr. R. addressed the committee at considerable length, setting forth the objections he held against the bill, and which, in substance, are as follows:

He said he did not desire to extend protection to those who committed frauds upon the revenue. He wished that a bill should be passed, but he wished it to be such a one as was in conformity to the Constitution of the United States. He did not think that the present bill was so; and, from the number of amendments which the Committee on Manufactures had themselves proposed—none of which, however, embraced the constitutional objections which he entertained, and which were four in number—the bill was evidently in so crude a state as to render it unwise to act upon it in its present form. As, however, the CHAIR had decided that a motion to recommit was not in order, he had substituted for it a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

And the question having been stated to the committee,

Mr. RHETT proceeded. He did not wish to say any thing which might look like a reflection on the collector of the port of New York; so far as he (Mr. R.) knew any thing of that gentleman, he was worthy of all the confidence which was reposed in him. Nor, he (Mr. R.) hoped, would any gentleman suppose it to be his wish that frauds perpetrated on the revenue should not be suppressed. He would go as far as any man in all proper means to suppress them; for if it was right that laws should exist, it was right, also, that they should be enforced. It was due to the honest and upright merchants of the country that such frauds should be suppressed; and if the bill had not been liable to objections under the Constitution, he should have left it to those who represent the commercial interests, the large commercial cities, in order that they might arrange its details and provisions.

The first objection which he entertained was to the sixth section, (which he asked the CLERK again to read,) and which is as follows:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the collector or appraisers of any port or district to call before him or them, and examine, upon oath, any owner, importer, or consignee, or other person, touching any matter or thing which they may deem material in ascertaining the ownership or true value of any goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or entered, or which may be about to be entered, and to require the production, on oath, to the collector, or to any permanent appraiser, of any letters, accounts, or invoices, in the possession or under the control of such owner, importer, or consignee, relating to the same; for which purpose they are authorized to administer oaths, and to put such interrogatories or questions as such collector or appraisers shall deem proper; and if such owner, importer, or consignee, on being served with personal notice, one day before the time appointed for attending before such collector or appraisers, shall fail to attend, unless prevented by sickness or by the consent of the collector, or, when attending, shall decline to answer such interrogatories or questions put by such collector or appraisers, or shall fail to produce any of the letters, accounts, or invoices before referred to, when and in the manner required by said collector, such merchandise shall be forfeited, and the proceeds thereof distributed according to law. And in case a notice so to appear before any such collector or appraisers shall be served by being left at the usual place of business of such owner, importer, or consignee, and he shall fail to attend in pursuance of such notice, for a period of thirty days, the appraisement or value fixed upon such merchandise by said appraisers shall be final and conclusive in all courts or places, any law or act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding; and any person, other than such owner, importer, or consignee, who having been so called, on personal notice, shall fail to attend before such collector or appraisers, shall pay one thousand dollars as a forfeiture to the United States, to be recovered as in an action of debt; and any person who shall swear falsely on such examination shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and if he shall be the owner, importer, or consignee, the goods, wares, or merchandise shall be forfeited."

This clause (Mr. R. said) proposed to give the collector power to summon either the importer, owner, consigner, or any other person, touching any matters or things therein enumerated. But it did not end there. If they did not, on personal notice given one day before the time appointed for attendance, the goods were forfeited—the collector (being the informant) to take one half, and the Government the other, (as under the existing law.) Now, his (Mr. R.'s) objection to this was, that it gave to the collector judicial power; that it erected him into a court, by which he was to try whether the goods were fraudulently imported or not—a power under which he could summon witnesses and put parties before him upon oath. He called upon the committee to say in what portion of the United States such power was ever given to any public Executive officer—that he himself, the party interested, should be the judge to call the parties before him, and to condemn them. And there was after trial in the matter, because the section distinctly said:

"And if such owner, importer, or consignee, on being served with personal notice, one day before the time appointed for attending before such collector or appraisers, shall fail to attend, unless prevented by sickness or by the consent of the collector, or, when attending, shall decline to answer such interrogatories or questions put by such collector or appraisers, or shall fail to produce any of the letters, accounts, or invoices, before referred to, when and in the manner required by said collector, such merchandise shall be forfeited, and the proceeds thereof distributed according to law."

Was not this an incongruity with the Constitution of the United States? The amended article of the Constitution [No. 7] declared that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." Here the value was not twenty dollars—it might be an unlimited amount. The act of 1799 declared that any officer who would be entitled to a share in the penalty should not, if he acted as a witness, have any portion of it. But in this bill there was no such provision.

Again. This clause compelled the parties to answer on oath before the collector. The fifth amended article of the Constitution of the United States declares that no person "shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Here the Constitution declared that a man should not, in a criminal case, be a witness against himself. The gentleman probably might say that it is not a criminal case; yet it was so, because the individual himself was liable to be indicted, imprisoned, and fined. If an individual was called up, he was compelled to answer. How could gentlemen reconcile this provision with our institutions—that a man should be compelled to criminate himself—and that, if he did not answer, his goods, as provided in this bill, should be forfeited? Mr. R. alluded to the ancient law of England, where, in case of an accused party standing mute, a jury were compelled to find the fact; yet, under this bill, without any jury rendering a verdict at all, the forfeiture ensued immediately and irreclaimably; and thus a man's whole estate might be put upon an issue of this kind before the collector.

Mr. R. then alluded to the penalty imposed by this section upon non-attending witnesses; and contended that such a penalty had never been known since the world began. Was it consistent with that article of the amended Constitution which declared that "excessive bail should not be required, nor excessive fines imposed?" Would any man say that this fine was not excessive? Mr. R. commented on that portion of the section which excepts from its penal operation only persons prevented by sickness, or those who were absent by consent of the collector; and expressed his belief that a bill filled with such crudities could not obtain the sanction of the committee.

He maintained the distinction in the Constitution, in relation to trial by jury, to be this: the collector might seize the goods, might dispossess the individuals of them, when there was good ground to suppose crime; but there was the beginning and the end of the power under the Constitution. The question whether there was fraud or not was a question of fact. To go beyond that was to violate that clause of the Constitution which guarantied to every man trial by jury.

Mr. R. then turned the attention of the committee to the 9th section of the bill, which is as follows:

"Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever a suit shall be tried in any court in the United States in which is involved any question of duties on importation of goods, wares, or merchandise, no person having an interest in such question shall be competent as a witness on such trial, unless called to testify by the adverse party."

Mr. R. continued. One of the amendments reported to the bill provided that no person having a similar interest with the party to the suit should be a competent witness, unless called by the adverse party. The section as originally reported said any interest at all. The amendment rendered the clause less objectionable than it was; but he still doubted whether it did not interfere with the right of trial by jury. Because, if you altered the testimony that should go to a jury, you certainly affected the trial by jury itself. If you could interfere in one form, you could in another. The principle of the common law was, that no man interested in the event of a suit should be a competent witness; but the gentleman from Massachusetts went further, and said if a person had a similar interest he should not be competent. The common law, did not exclude such a person—it simply declared that the fact should go to his credibility with the jury. The gentleman from Massachusetts, not content with that, would exclude the testimony altogether.

These were grave matters. He (Mr. R.) might be willing to go as far as the furthest, to detect and punish frauds; but he would tell gentlemen that he would not touch the Constitution of the United States for the whole revenue of the Union a million times told over. It was the charter of our liberties and rights; if it could be touched for one purpose, it could for another, and so on until all our liberties might be destroyed.

Mr. R. then called attention to the 11th section, which is as follows:

"SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That when any collector, naval officer, or surveyor, shall have cause to suspect that any goods, wares, or merchandise, in any house, store, or other place, have been imported into the United States without any duties having been paid or secured to be paid thereon, or less duties having been paid thereon, through the fraud of the importer or importers, or any person or persons acting on their behalf, than they are by law subject to pay, then, in every such case, it shall and may be lawful for the judge of the district court at the district in which such goods may be found, on application, under oath, of said collector, naval officer, or surveyor, to issue a warrant authorizing such collector, naval officer, or surveyor, with such assistants as may be necessary, to enter any such house, store, or other place, in the daytime only, and there to search for such goods, wares, or merchandise; and if any such goods, wares, or merchandise, be found in the hands or possession of the original importer or importers thereof, or any other person or persons who purchased or received the same, knowing them to have been illegally imported without payment of the duties required by law, to seize and secure the same for trial; and all such goods, wares, or merchandise, on which no duties have been paid or secured, or on which, through the fraud of the importer or importers, or any person or persons acting on their behalf, less duties have been paid or secured, than they are by law subject to pay, shall be forfeited; and such collector, naval officer, or surveyor, may, at the time of making such seizure, call on such importer or importers to produce and exhibit the original invoices of said goods, wares, or merchandise, or copies thereof; and a refusal to produce the same shall be considered prima facie evidence of an illegal importation of such goods, wares, or merchandise."

Mr. R. continued. This section gave the power of search—a power most jealously guarded by our ancestors—for they knew it was liable to abuse. The 4th article of the amendments to the Constitution declared that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." Now, could not the gentleman have put the Constitution into this clause, if he meant it to apply? Mr. R. contrasted this provision with the provisions of the act of '99.

One would have supposed that five or six objections were enough; but there were other objections, though probably not so great. Mr. R. then alluded to that part of the tenth section, which, in addition to other things, imposed civil disability on public officers found aiding and abetting the commission of frauds. If the Constitution was now making, he said, he might be willing to say that any man convicted of a criminal offence in the courts of our country should not hold office; but, by the Constitution of the United States, the qualifications of President and Members of Congress are fixed.

In the last clause of the 12th amended article, it was declared that "no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States." What was the meaning of constitutional eligibility? Could Congress superadd to the Constitution of the United States, save by two-thirds? Could it superadd a disqualification which the Constitution did not contain? Suppose Mr. Swartwout had returned from Europe—suppose that the laws of the United States had rendered his acts felony, and that he had been tried, convicted, and punished; suppose the people should think proper to elect him Vice President, or even President; would the gentleman's law, if passed by Congress, hinder Swartwout from taking his seat? No, he would hold up the Constitution and say, this designates my eligibility, your law is a nullity; and so would every tribunal in the land declare. He (Mr. R) contended that this was not a constitutional provision, unless the Constitution declared the inability.

Mr. R. after urging one or two more objections, not of a constitutional character, said that he opposed the bill because it gave improper power to the Executive arm of this country—a power given in no other country.* If such enormous power were required to collect duties, it would be infinitely better that this whole system should be abandoned. He believed the great fault of the Constitution was, that it gave the Government this power of indirect taxation by duties. He believed we never should have proper and effectual responsibility in the Government, until we came back to a system of direct taxation. Whenever that time came, we should find no cause to complain of Executive abuses in the expenditure of the public money.

Mr. ADAMS obtained the floor, but at the suggestion of Mr. ATHERTON, yielded it; when, on motion of the latter gentleman, the committee rose, and the SPEAKER of the House having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that said committee had considered the bill, and come to no resolution thereon.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the House took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government, to consider the amendments made to that bill by the Senate.

The two first, which were merely formal, were concurred in. The third amendment proposed to strike out the item appropriating 45,000 dollars for the Documentary History of the American Revolution.

Mr. ATHERTON moved that the House concur with the Senate in the amendment; and he went into a long and critical examination of the contract and the law under which it had been made, and urged the concurrence of the House in the amendment, with a view to have an inquiry instituted into all the circumstances of the case, so that the House might act understandingly. He disapproved of the manner of the distribution. If the work was to be progressed with, he was understood to be in favor of its distribution to public libraries of the country, instead of the members of the Twenty-fourth, Twenty-fifth, and Twenty sixth Congresses, as provided for in the resolution, authorizing the distribution. There was no provision for extending the distribution to the present or future Congresses. He was understood to say that, by the terms of the contract, the publishers were unlimited as to the size of the volumes. There had been no person appointed by the Government to superintend the publication; but that the contractors had the authority to go on and publish all the newspapers published in the country at that time. He maintained that the proper course would be for the House to concur in the amendment of the Senate, and have a committee of inquiry to investigate the nature of the contract; and to enable such a committee to come to a correct conclusion, it would be necessary to examine many and voluminous documents. There was not then sufficient time afforded to make an examination, such as would justify the House in voting for the appropriation in this bill. They shou'd vote understandingly when they do vote; but the exigency which calls for immediate action on the bill, could not afford sufficient time to bring them to a proper understanding of the subject. It was not his intention to do injustice to the contractors; but was willing to give them the benefits of the contract, so far as it was understandingly entered into, and acted upon. He thought a committee of inquiry, to ascertain whether the prices were conformable to the resolution, and whether the contract was legal, was right, and proper. He was understood to say, that by a letter of the Secretary of State, it would appear that a saving of $200,000 might be effected on the publication, by an investigation of the matter. Notwithstanding the number of volumes was limited to twenty, which was estimated to cost about $500,000, yet there was no limitation to the number of pages in the volume, and they might be increased to such an extent as could make the work cost $1,000,000. He did not believe that the members of Congress who voted to authorize the contract believed that they were voting for the distribution of a million of dollars, in books, among themselves, and their successors. He then read a report of the Committe of Ways and Means, at a former Congress, showing that the prices paid were not in conformity to the act of Congress. He then read the act on which the prices were based, and a brief history of the proceedings of Congress in relation thereto, in proof of his position.

Mr. EVANS spoke in reply, referring to former discussions in the House on this subject, and contending that Congress was bound by the contract, and must fulfil it. He considered the objections advanced by Mr. ATHERTON as involving the integrity of Congress and the capacity and knowledge of the late Mr. Livingston, (with whom the contract was made,) and repelled with warmth the charge that Messrs. Clark and Force had been guilty of any fraud or impropriety whatever. He went into a recapitulation of the whole matter from the beginning: insisted that the contractors had fully complied with their engagement; stated that the work had been printed, and delivered, and received at the Departments; and remonstrated with earnestness against the proposed refusal to appropriate money to pay for it. He had no objection to a committee of inquiry, if gentlemen thought it expedient; but, in the mean time, there was no reason why the sum now justly due should not be appropriated. He quoted the opinions of Mr. Livingston on the work, and scouted the idea advanced by Mr. ATHERTON that it was useless, and would never be read. He adverted to the vast expense incurred by other nations in illustrating their past history, and the honors and profits conferred on those who collected and preserved the monuments of that history for posterity. The present work was limited in its extent, was worth more by far than all its cost; and would be an invaluable contribution to the libraries of our public literary and political institutions.

Mr. E. said that it was at the instance of the Secretary of State that Messrs. Clarke and Force memorialized Congress. They sent in, accompanying this memorial, the correspondence between the Secretary and themselves, directing the matter as minutely as it could be. They then stated to Congress that the work was of such magnitude, so large and expensive, that it could never be undertaken by private individuals. They gave Congress proper warning, and yet gentlemen came forward to make an impression that these gentlemen had used some deception. They even memorialized Congress to appoint a board of superintendence. The subject was before Congress two years; and the members were properly informed before the resolution authorizing the contract was passed. Congress then saw fit to pass a law authorizing the Secretary of State to make a contract on the basis of the memorial. The contract was drawn up by that Secretary without consultation with the contractors, and submitted to them. They refused to sign it on the ground that the price per volume was not sufficient. The contract was then placed in the hands of the Attorney General. He decided that the law was ambiguous, so far as it related to the price to be paid, which was to be based on the price paid for the first volume of the Diplomatic Correspondence. There being two works differing in the price, the Attorney General decided that the safest way was for the Secretary to take the work for which the smallest price was paid per volume, as a basis. These gentlemen refused to enter into the contract, believing it should be based on the highest price; and the Secretary, who felt great and praiseworthy interest in the matter that the work should be published, actually solicited them to enter into the contract as drawn up by him; and after some assurances, not on paper, they agreed to do so.

Mr. E. said the contractors had actually delivered two volumes of this work, and another was nearly finished, and would be delivered shortly. They were actually suffering for the money now due them; and if it was to be withheld for the possible contingency of a modification of the contract, it would be doing them crying injustice; and he remonstrated against the cruelty, injustice, and oppression of attempting to coerce the industrious and enterprising contractors for this work, by keeping them out of their just dues, until they might, from embarrassments, be induced to relinquish their contract. They had already expended $106,000 paid out, and mostly now due, and for which they were now daily called upon to meet, and the Government had as yet paid them but $25,000. These gentlemen have been in every State of the Union, and in England, collecting materials for this work; and have had a great number of clerks transcribing important documents in all those places, and have actually collected an immense quantity for future volumes. The amount now proposed to be appropriated would not compensate them for the outlay they have made for this purpose alone. It would be ruinous to them to withhold the money. He then adverted to the past practice of Government in paying persons to supervise and edit works, under the patronage of Congress; but that these gentlemen do not get a cent for their immense labor of this kind. The copy of other works referred to was furnished to the printer in proper order to print; but these gentlemen are compelled to prepare the matter themselves, and thus to that extent lessen the profits on the work. They actually receive nothing for the expenditure for the labor of clerks, and for their editorial labors.

In reply to the arguments advanced for the discontinuance of the work, to indemnify the contractors, he said it would cost almost as much to justly compensate them, as it would do to go through with the contract. Mr. E. said so far as the validity of the contract was concerned, that the Secretary of State did make a detailed report, which was referred to the Committee on Finance; and that that committee made a report, and declared that it was a valid and binding contract, based on law, and that the publishers had performed their part of the contract.

Mr. E. then adverted to the fairness with which the contractors had acted in their efforts and solicitations to prevail on Congress to appoint a board to which they wished the whole matter to be submitted for investigation—and their anxiety for Congress to authorize a proper person to supervise and select the matter for publication. Yet Congress did not choose to do so. They have literally fulfilled their part of the contract which was made by the Secretary of State under the direction of the Attorney General; yet gentlemen complained that all was not right in the contract—that there was some deception. They actually warned you of the magnitude of the work, and urged upon you to superintend its publication, and you neglected to do so. On your part, then, there could be no just cause of complaint.

Mr. E said he would agree to any proposition to limit, or supervise, or examine the matter; but the expense had been incurred for these three volumes, and they had been delivered, and should be paid for, without reference to the future action of Congress, or future limitations. He then read Mr. Livingston's opinion of the great advantages of the work to the present generation and to posterity. It would afford the means to prevent them from losing sight of the cause from which the Government originated, and the principles on which it is founded.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

ERRATA.—Several transpositions occur in No. 23, page 360, of the Congressional Globe. The words, "Mr. ALBERT SMITH said he understood the gentleman from North Carolina to infer that this Mr. Washington was a," in the second column, seventh line, should have been placed in the first column, thirty-third line, after the word "discovered," so as to read, "Mr. Washington was a clerk in the Land Office," &c. In the first column, seventy-ninth line, in Mr. RAMSEY's remarks, after the words, "There were also charges intimated against a high and worthy," the words, "officer of the Treasury," &c. which were misplaced in the ninth line of the second column, should have been inserted down to the words "Vice Presidency."

Mr. E. considered this work of more importance than any work published in the English language. It would stand as a permanent memorial of the past. He maintained that the distribution of these books to members, to be carried into every Congressional district in the country, was the best mode to dispose of them. He regared the work of incalculable value, and prized it highly; and the more that was gathered of the memorials of the past the better; and hoped if materials of the proper kind would justify, that the work would be extended to forty volumes. The price of the work (twenty volumes) he maintained, would not cost more than $408,000 instead of a million as stated by the gentleman from New Hampshire. All who received the work should be proud of it. He rejoiced that he had lent his aid for its publication, and hoped that some other work would yet be started to preserve more of the memorials of the past. If the appropriation was not made in this bill, he could see no other mode in which the subject could be reached. It was nothing more than common honesty that they should pay the contractors for the books delivered. He concluded by saying that the work was an honor to the country, to Congress, to the Secretary of State, and to the contractors themselves; and he rejoiced in lending his efforts to its continuance and completion.

Mr. SALTONSTALL followed on the same side, insisting on the sacred obligation of an acknowledged contract, and the duty of the Government to comply with it, and dwelling on the peculiar advantage of this Republic over other nations, in its being able thus to secure the original monuments of its history. He went into an enumeration of the subjects to be embraced in the work, insisting on its great value, and the impossibility of its publication unless under Governmental patronage.

Mr. PETRIKIN expressed his willingness to investigate the matter at another time, and on a proper occasion, but could not consent to have the appropriation bill delayed by a debate on this amendment, and thereby stop the wheels of Government. He therefore moved the previous question on the motion to concur.

Mr. HUBBARD moved a call of the House.

Mr. BARNARD moved to adjourn, on which motion Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The motion to adjourn was then withdrawn.

The question then recurring on the motion for a call of the House, the yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 50, nays 50. The CHAIR voted in the affirmative. So the call was ordered; and, after another ineffectual motion to adjourn, was proceeded in until 132 members answered to their names.

On motion of Mr. L. BOYD, all further proceedings in the call were suspended.

The question then recurring on Mr. PETRIKIN's call for the previous question, it was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

And on the main question, "Shall the amendment of the Senate be concurred in?" Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 73, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Carr, Clifford, Coles, M. A. Cooper, W R. So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HUBBARD moved a call of the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BARNARD moved to adjourn; but the House refused the motion.

The question was then put on calling the House, and decided as follows—yeas 50, nays 50.

There being a tie,

The CHAIR voted in the affirmative; so a call was ordered. The House was then called. 109 gentlemen responded to their names; the absentees were called; 132 then answered; and the doors of the House being closed, the call proceeded.

Mr. BOYD moved to suspend the call, and the motion prevailed. So the doors were opened, and the call suspended.

The question recurring on Mr. PETRIKIN's call for the previous question, it was seconded, put, and carried; and the main question being on concurring with the Senate in their proposed amendment of the appropriation bill, (striking out the appropriation for Clarke and Force's Documentary History of the United States,) it was decided by yeas and nays as follows: yeas 73, nays 48.

So the House concurred in the Senate's amendment, and this important and much desired bill now waits only for the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON presented a request of the Convention on National Education, now met in this city, for the use of the hall on Saturday evening next; which was granted.

The bill to prevent frauds in the collection of the revenue was made the special order for to-morrow.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, May 8, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a memorial from citizens of New York, praying for the release from imprisonment of W. L. Mackenzie; which was ordered to be transmitted to the President of the United State.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Enoch Hidden; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred House bill for the relief of Ebenezer A. Lester, recommended its indefinite postponement; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also from the same committee, to which was referred House bill for the relief of Ebenezer Lobdell, made a favorable report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Ebenezer Lilley; which was agreed to.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred

The petition of James Vanosten and made unfavorable reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

The petition of Lewis H. Harper;

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the report of the Secretary of War in relation to a general system of national defence, reported it back to the Senate, with a recommendation that it be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. B. from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution instructing them to inquire into the propriety of dispensing with the annual appropriation for defraying the expenses of the Board of Visiters to West Point Military Academy; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing experiments to be made upon the application of steam vessels to harbor defence.

The Senate then adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 8, 1840.

Almost immediately after the reading of the journal, the House, on motion of Mr. ADAMS, went again into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BELL in the chair,) on the bill "to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports."

And the question being on a motion of Mr. RHETT of South Carolina, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill—

Mr. ADAMS resisted that motion, and contended that if there were defects in the bill, they ought to be amended, but that the bill itself, being for an important and a legitimate object ought not to be destroyed. He noticed, incidentally, some of Mr. RHETT's general objections; reserving those which applied to particular sections of the bill, until those sections should be reached in the regular course of the discussion.

Mr. A. then proposed that before taking any question on the motion of Mr. RHETT, which went to destroy the bill, it should be read by sections for amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana inquired whether the bill had been reported with the unanimous consent of the Committe on Manufactures.

Mr. ADAMS replied that no objections has been made in committee; though, of course, the members of the committee might, possibly, have different views as to some of its details.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana wished to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the bill, in its present shape, had been reported by the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. ADAMS replied that the bill had, after being drawn up with the assistance of the United States District Attorney and Collector of New York, been reported without opposition from any member of the committee; he presumed, however, with the understanding that each member of the committee would be at liberty to offer such amendments to the bill as he might deem proper.

Mr. DAVIS said his object in asking the question was to ascertain if certain defects existed in the bill which were alleged to exist by the editor of the New York Express. From the article in that paper, it would appear that the bill gave the Collector of New York unlimited power, and rendered an importer who should refuse to answer any question, of whatever nature, liable to the payment of a fine, or the forfeiture of his goods.

With a view of illustrating his meaning, Mr. D. read the following extract from the New York Express:

"IMPORTANT TO IMPORTERS.

"A bill has been reported to the House of Representatives at Washington, entiled a "Bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties or imposts. The title is decidedly a misnomer. It should read, as an act to clothe the Collector of the port of New York with unlimited power over the merchants. A brief abstract of the provisions of the bill will show the justice of this opinion.

"If the collector asks a voter where he was at the last election, or how he intends to vote at the next election, or any other question, and he declines answering, his goods are forfeited.

"But this section enacts further, that if the appraisement shall be fifteen per cent. above the invoice, it shall be prima facie evidence (only!) of fraud. The reason of this absurdly ridiculous section is to be accounted for in Mr. Woodbury's wish to blind the public.

"SECTION 10. Would seem to be borrowed from Mr. Wright's 'bill to keep the keeper.' It makes it highly penal for any C. H. officer to be corrupt," &c. !!

SECTION 14. That the SPOILS shall be distributed as usual to the collector, &c."

His object in rising was to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether these defects did really exist.

Mr. ADAMS said he had not seen the number of the Express which contained the article in question; but he had read several New York papers in which were articles of a similar character. All he had to say was, that these Yorkshire traders understood very well how to fill the newspapers with denunciations against laws which were calculated to detect their frauds. That system was understood perfectly well by these defrauders of our revenue. Such was no more than was to be expected from such men, who scruple at no means whatever to gain their ends; and it was no wonder that they should fill the newspapers with invective against the custom-house officers.

But, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, he would say that the object of this bill was to diminish the profits of the collector, and, so far from increasing the "spoils," as was alleged, the operation of the bill would be to reduce the fees and emoluments of the collector, by preventing the frauds from which those emoluments arose.

Mr. ADAMS said that the New York papers abounded with similar articles, and also with some on the other side. It was easy to understand that those interested in the evils to be corrected by the bill could find ways and means of filling the papers with articles intended to create a prejudice against it.

Mr. SERGEANT next rose and recapitulated the entire course of previous legislation with a view to enforce the collection of duties, and made an argument to show that the bill ought not be destroyed, but perfected, as some further provision to effect its purpose was greatly needed. He admitted, however, that the best of all provisions would be to appoint competent and faithful officers to execute the revenue laws.

Mr. TILLINGHAST replied to the inquiry of Mr. DAVIS, stating that the members of the Committee on Manufactures had all concurred in the principles of the bill, though they did not all perfectly agree as to some of its details. He added a few words in reply to Mr. RHETT's objections to the bill.

Mr. RHETT responded, and Mr. TILLINGHAST rejoined and further explained.

Mr. RHETT then went into some general remarks in favor of free trade and a low tariff. He argued that a system of direct taxation would be the most just mode of taxing the people; it would afford them the means of knowing how much money they paid to the support of the Government, and would prevent profligacy and extravagance in the expenditures of Government. He contended that that mode would be the only sure preventive against frauds; and on the other hand, that the higher the tariff, the greater was the inducement to commit frauds; in fact, that the indirect mode of taxation by tariff was productive of many evils, and had a peculiar tendency to engender immorality. He concluded by withdrawing his motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the understanding that it should then be recommitted to the Committee on Manufactures, to be by them remodelled.

Mr. SERGEANT, although not approving every feature in the bill, opposed the motion, thinking it better now to discuss any amendments which should be proposed.

Mr. ADAMS also opposed the motion to rise. If the committee were to remodel the bill, let them first hear all the objections to it. As to those advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina, if there were none more formidable, he should not think of making any alteretion in the bill.

Mr. RHETT then put his motion in this form: That the committee rise with a view to a motion that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. ADAMS expressed an earnest hope that the motion would not be agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to rise, and the vote stood—ayes 21, noes 62.

So the committee refused to rise, but no quorum voted.

And the committee then rose, and the chairman reported to the House that the committee found itself without a quorum.

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House, which motion having prevailed,

The CLERK called the roll, and ninety members answered to their names.

And the names of the absentees having been called over, 107 members appeared to be present. The doors of the hall were then closed. Several excuses were received. After which a quorum being present, all further proceedings on the call were, on motion of Mr. ADAMS, suspended.

And the House again went into committee, and proceeded, section by section, to the consideration of the bill.

A number of amendments, none of them eliciting any discussion beyond mere explanations, except as hereinafter mentioned, were proposed and agreed to; but as it is impossible for them to be understood without inserting the provisions of the bill itself, they are reserved fo a future occasion.

A motion was made by Mr. RHETT to strike out the 7th section; which motion was negatived.

Mr. CURTIS moved to strike from the 9th section the words which provide for the exemption of the United States from any stipulation as to costs.

This amendment gave rise to same debate, and the question was not taken when, on motion of Mr. HABERSHAM, the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. ADAMS moved to make the bill the special order for to-morrow; on which motion no quorum voted.

Whereupon, the House adjourned.

[The debate on the above bill was of an interesting character, and of such a nature that nothing less than a full report would do justice to the gentlemen who participated in it. A full report will be given hereafter.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, May 9, 1840.

On leave given, Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky presented a memorial, which was appropriately referred.

EXECUTION OF THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ADAMS asked that the House would, by general consent, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill "to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports."

Mr. HABERSHAM said that when he moved that the committee rise last evening, he had stated that he did so because he considered that the bill involved principles which required the serious consideration and reflection of the committee and of the House.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that debate was not in order.

Mr. HABERSHAM said he was not going into a debate.

The SPEAKER inquired whether the gentleman objected to the proposition of Mr. ADAMS?

Mr. H. said he did.

Mr. ADAMS thereupon moved a suspension of the rule; on which motion the yeas having been announced as 69—

Mr. HABERSHAM said that, as it appeared to be the sense of the House that the bill should be taken up, he would withdraw his objection.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, [Mr. BELL in the chair,] and resumed the consideration of the bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports.

The question pending when the committee rose on yesterday, was on the motion of Mr. CURTIS to strike from the 8th section of the bill the words in said section in italics.

SEC 8 And be it further enacted, That in all cases when a commission shall be sued out on the part of any claimant to goods seized by any officer of the revenue, to take the testimony of witnesses living in a foreign country, it shall be lawful for the District Attorney of the United States, when such proceedings are had in behalf of the United States, to nominate one commissioner to execute said commission, without being compelled to give or enter into any stipulation in reference to the costs thereof, any rule or order of any court to the contrary notwithstanding.

[The effect of this amendment would be to make the United States liable for costs of the commission to take testimony that might be sued out on the part of any claimant to goods seized.]

The question was taken on the motion to strike out, and it was rejected.

Mr. EVERETT moved to amend the 8th section, by adding the words in italics in the clause below, viz:

"And if, in the execution of such commission, it shall appear that any witnesses, called to testify before such commissioners on the part of said claimant or claimants, on his examination under such commission, shall have refused without just cause to produce any books, accounts, or paper writings, called for on the part of the United States, the testimony of such witness or witnesses shall not be read on the trial of the cause of such seizure."

Mr. PETRIKIN wished to know who was to be the judge of what was a just cause.

Mr. EVERETT explained; after which the question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT moved further to amend the 8th section by inserting the words, "papers which shall be called for on the part of the United States."

Messrs. ADAMS, TILLINGHAST, CLIFFORD, and FILLMORE were of opinion that the former amendment just agreed to, superseded the necessity of the latter.

The question then being taken, the amendment was rejected.

And the 9th section of the bill having been then read in the words following, to wit:

"Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever a suit shall be tried in any court in the United States in which is involved any question of duties on importations of goods, wares, or merchandise, no person having an interest in such question shall be competent as a witness on such trial, unless called to testify by the adverse party."

Which said section the Committee on Manufactures had heretofore moved to amend by striking out all after the word "enacted," and inserting the following:

"That whenever a suit against any collector or other officer of the customs for the seizure of goods, wares, or merchandise unlawfully imported into the United States, or forfeited for the unlawful entry of the same, shall be tried by any court of the United States, in which suit is involved any question of duties on importations of goods, wares, or merchandise, no person having the same interest with that of the party to the suit in the question at issue shall be competent as a witness on such trial, unles called to testify by the adverse party."

Mr. ADAMS explained that the object of the amendment was to prohibit, in future, the practice of one importer or underwriter being permitted to testify on the trial of another. Mr. A. said it was usual for perhaps ten or twelve importers to be sued at once, and yet such was the present practice, that each one was allowed to testify in the case of the other. He cited various legal authorities that this course was in direct violation of the common law.

Mr. A. said that this section had been altered from that proposed in the draft by the Collector of the Customs of New York and the District Attorney there. It limited the variation from the law of evidence as practised by the courts, very much beyond the proposition contained in the official bill. This was one of the features of the bill to which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] had taken exception the other day; and it was also one to which he (Mr. A.) had anticipated there might be much objection, inasmuch as it had some tendency to limit the competency of witnesses on the part of the parties charged. He would ask, in the first place, that the explanations of the collector in relation to this section might be read.

Mr. HOFFMAN had no doubt that the Government was defrauded out of millions of revenue by foreign importers. He argued that however anxious he was that the Government should be protected against frauds committed by this outward enemy, he did not consider that that enemy was so powerful that they should do away with the principles of the common law to detect and overthrow it. He knew that it was to the interest of the honest importer that a bill in some shape should be passed; but he contended that, by the section under consideration in its present shape, the honest man would be sacrificed to detect the dishonest. It treated all as if they were dishonest, which he considered was wrong in principle. The powers given in this section to the collector subverted in fact the trial by jury. He wished that collector to be armed with ample power to punish dishonest importers, but was opposed to subverting the principles of the common law, and do injustice thereby to the innocent for the purpose of detecting and punishing the guilty.

Mr. PETRIKIN said it might be thought by some, because he did not come from a district in which there was a seaport, that he should take no part in the discussion on the bill, but he thought it the duty of Representatives from all parts of the country to make an effort to protect the revenues. This section of all others was the more necessary, and with which he was satisfied. He thought that it was high time that Congress should legislate on this subject, to prevent and put a stop to innovation by the judges and the courts on the rights of the Government and the citizen, by giving wrong construction to the laws. Speculation has become now so universal as even to corrupt the courts and the judges. Lawyers seemed to be startled at this suggestion. They need not be, for judges are, like other men, liable to be operated upon by the same causes which influence the actions of other men. The judges of the United States Court are irresponsible. They have changed the law by their decisions to such an extent that it is impossible to tell what the law is. You may say to-day what it is, but it is impossible to say what it will be to-morrow, or a month hence. The common law is one thing to-day, but to-morrow it will be another. If he understood common law, it was just and universal in its operation—the same in one section of the country as in the other. But was it so? No. The courts give one decision in New York, and the courts in Philadelphia give another and entirely different one, under the same law. It was then high time to decide what was to be the law of evidence. It was high time that the tax payers—men not living in the cities—men in every part of the country—should come forward, and pass such acts as would effectually guard the revenues of the country, and protect the honest merchant and the manufacturer against the gross injustice done them, through fraud on the revenue, by these foreign importers. We are told that the bill would do injustice to innocent men. He denied it. There was no man who was not, in a greater or less degree, influenced by his own interests. Merchants and judges are no better than other men. They are all liable to be swerved from the strict rules of morality, when their interests at stake are large, and when the inducements to frauds are great. He hoped the lawyers here from New York and elsewhere would not be so touchy. He looked upon the bill as carrying out the good maxim of equal and exact justice to all. He hoped the section of the bill would be passed—it was of all others the most important, and without it the bill would be of no effect; fraud could be committed with impunity.

Mr. RHETT was opposed to the amendment. He said that on the same principle a son might be prohibited from giving evidence in favor of his father, and vice versa; hence both were interested by the ties of nature. He contended that the amendment, if adopted, would be a violation of the Constituiion, and the first principles of common law, and that if the principle was sacrificed in one instance, it might be done in all others. Perhaps gentlemen would like the collector to have arbitrary power, and dispense with the trial by jury altogether. But so long as there was trial by jury, the Government must bow to the majesty of the people. The more the Government could be checked, the better it would be for the people. He would never lend his aid to arm the Government against the people.

Mr. BRIGGS did not see how the question of trial by jury was involved in this matter. He did not see that it was proposed to interfere in this great constitutional right. He could not perceive that this section of the bill contemplated interference with any great constitutional principle. It was merely a question of evidence or law in relation to the admission of evidence of certain individuals. By the common law proper, a man who was interested in a cause could not be admitted as evidence. But one innovation had followed another, so that the strict rule had, in a measure, been departed from. But he must confess that, with all his deference to the universality of the practice, he was at a loss to see its wisdom. He could not say much for the verdict in favor of a man whose suit should be determined on the testimony of another man, interested in the individual question.

In this case, the evidence was not so much in relation to matters of fact as to matters of opinion, which, he conceived, render it very doubtful as to whether the testimony of interested persons should be received. The object of this bill was to prevent frauds on the revenue, and he saw nothing in it calculated to do the least injustice to upright men. Its object was to punish those of an opposite character, and, for his part, he cared not how much they might suffer. In questions of property, he did not see the propriety of allowing individuals to testify who were themselves interested. And although this innovation of law had been tolerated, he should vote for the section with the proviso.

Mr. TILLINGHAST thought if any legislation was had on the subject, so as to alter the laws of evidence, then such alteration should be general, and made to apply not only to cases between certain individuals and the Government, but also to cases where individuals themselves were concerned.

Mr. BARNARD objected to the amendment. He considered it objectionable to the section itself. He cited many cases from English law books to show that the common law of the country did not disqualify a man to give evidence in cases where he was interested in the question involved. He would never consent to entertain a proposition, which sought to establish one rule in cases in which the Government was concerned, and which did not apply to all other cases. He wished the door thrown open wide in relation to the admission of evidence, and if there was any thing which distinguished the present day in the advances made in the system of jurisprudence, it was the fact that every sound lawyer was desirous that the laws of evidence should be relaxed.

Mr. LINCOLN was opposed to the proviso. He saw no reason why a particular rule of evidence should be adopted in cases where the Government was concerned, and which would not apply to individuals. Was property, he would ask, more valuable than life? Then on what what ground could they seek to establish a law of evidence in relation to the revenue, which could not be admitted when the right and life a citizen were concerned.

He was of the same opinion as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] that the common law of England did not exclude the testimony of a witness, merely because he might have an interest in the question involved. He had always understood the common law of England was a law of liberty, which guarded the property, life, and liberty of the subject, and he would be very sorry for the introduction of any partial legislation which should contravene the usage of former years.

He was extremely desirous that the revenue laws should be strictly enforced, not only for the prevention of fraud, but for the protection of the great manufacturing interest of the country, of which he was partly an humble representative. But, however great might be the advantage to the country by an increase of the revenue, he could not consent to sacrifice or violate any great principle of civil liberty, in accomplishing it. He feared the proposed amendment would, if adopted, leave the honest man, in many cases, without the means of protection. There was so much apparent danger in it, that it would require stronger arguments that had been hitherto urged, to reconcile him to it.

Mr. SERGEANT spoke at some length in opposition to this section of the bill. He had not so much objection to the modification proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as he had to the section as originally reported. He argued that the section was disrespectful to the trial by jury. It would be, in effect, saying that a jury could not be trusted. He examined into the powers of the collector under existing laws, and was understood to contend that in this particular question at issue, he had ample power. The effect of the section would be that if the collector had made several improper seizures, the parties affected by the seizure would be excluded from testifying in either of the cases. He contended that the common law did not exclude a man from giving testimony in a question in which he was interested. In reply to the remarks of Mr. PETRIKIN, a to the irregularity of the decisions under the common law, he contended that no judge ever altered the common law, or had the power to do it. There was no judge with hardihood enough to do it. He also argued that there was no tribunal in this country where a man is excluded from giving testimony in a question in which he was interested. It was a settled principle in the common law of this land, that he may give testimony. There was a well established and universal rule of evidence; and there was no reason that there should be an exception in this case, by a departure from that rule.

Mr. VANDERPOEL looked upon this section as the most vital portion of the bill. It had been agreed by all that there were very great evils existing, and that it was necessary Congress should interpose some remedy. He believed this portion of the bill was necessary to secure an efficient remedy for the evils. Under that impression, he would vote for the section and the proviso added by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

It struck him that all these learned disquisitions on the comparative merits of the common and civil law, were entirely uncalled for. All that was necessary to determine was, first, what is the law of the land as at present administered; and, second, is it expedient that we shall change that law?

It had been agreed on all hands that the law, as at present administered, is, that when a witness is interested in the event of a suit, that alone disqualified him; and that an interest in the question only did not disqualify him.

The section now under consideration proposes that an interest in the question shall be considered a disqualification, as well as an interest in the event of the suit.

He had listened with very great attention to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] and the two gentlemen from New York [Messrs. BARNARD and FILLMORE] had said, but he had heard nothing to satisfy him that, by adopting this section, we should do any violence to any great principle of liberty. It was his firm conviction that, by the adoption of this section, we should do a great deal more good than mischief. Under that belief he would vote for the section and amendment.

These frauds, as was observed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] have grown up into a system of stupendous magnitude; and the question now is whether we shall admit testimony particeps criminis.

Why, suppose thirty or forty suits were brought against the collector; what mischief might not arise by preconcerted action with these villains who combine together for defrauding the revenue!

But, says the gentleman from New York, the collector may thus prosecute an innocent man, who is prohibited under the section from availing himself of the testimony of individuals engaged in the business. This could scarcely ever occur, where an innocent man could be endangered. It was next to impossible for injury to result to an innocent man. There were in the city of New York five hundred or a thousand respectable merchants who could have no interest in the question, whose testimony might be taken. Or if it were necessary, a commission might be established and the necessary facts procured by sending to England, the place from whence the goods came.

It was hardly to be presumed that an honest man could suffer under the provisions of this bill, as there were so many means of proving his innocence. It would be just as hard for an innocent man to suffer, as it would be for a false witness to persist in a lie before a court.

He had heard a great deal said about the danger of change. His experience in legislation had long since convinced him that the profession of which he was an humble member, were so much attached to ancient usages that they were strongly averse to change. Their partiality to the rules of their ancestors was so great as to render them insensible, to a great degree, to the necessity of any departure from them.

The principle of common law required that for a witness to be disqualified, he must have an interest in the event of the suit.

But the great mischief arising from this was, that, with this restriction only, a strong inducement to perjury was held out, and a strong temptation existed for these foreign villains to coalesce in defrauding the revenue. God forbid that his attachment to the common law should be such as to prevent him from voting for a change in particular cases, when it was so much needed.

This great system of defrauding the revenue has increased to a fearful extent, and is leading from fraud to perjury; and yet gentlemen get up and tell us about the dangers of any change. But I would remind those gentlemen that it may be necessary to make changes in favor of Government, when it may not be necessary to make a change in relation to individuals.

The Government has great and formidable interests, of a magnitude far exceeding any case where individuals may be concerned; and these interests are more liable to be endangered under the application of particular principles than those of individuals. Yet we fold our arms and say there shall be no change. Why gentlemen talked about not violating the rule, and yet it had been violated already. In suits in which Government was concerned, did it ever pay any costs? Was there not in that case a departure from the rule already? Yet gentlemen say it is dangerous to apply different rules to the Government and individuals. Why, in this case, did not the rule apply to the one as well as to the other?

Mr. V. then went on to show that for a very long period, the question as to what constituted an interest, so as to disqualify a witness, had been unsettled by the court.

But gentlemen in their speeches upon the common law, seemed to have lost sight of one of its greatest excellences. They appeared to have forgotten its malleability—its capacity for varying and changing, so as to accommodate itself to the various interests and circumstances of society.

Here a new interest had arisen by this system of fraud, by this combination of villains to defraud our revenue; and yet gentlemen say we have no right to vary the rules of our common law so as to meet the emergency.

It was competent for a legislative body to create new crimes, (that was technically,) and it was also competent to say what testimony should be taken to prove those offences. Here was a long bill providing penalties for new offences, and was it not competent for Congress to state in what manner these offences shall be proved?

The arguments of gentlemen against a change in the common law, were, some of them, very plausible, and, at first view, appeared very sound; but when they came to be examined by the standard of common sense, it was evident that much more mischief would result from a refusal to adopt this section, than by the retention of the law as at present administered in the courts. Let gentlemen weigh it in the scales, and balance the account.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania contends that the withholding of this interested evidence would be a disrespect to the jury, who would be anxious to have all the evidence. The arguments of that gentleman, he was constrained to say, appeared to him more specious than sound. So far as his experience had taught him, he would say with no disrespect to the juror, that if in a trial he were to have his choice, he would much rather take his chance with the individual than with Government. For the least knowledge of human nature would show, that in cases of trial between the Government and an individual, the sympathy of a juror was excited most powerfully in favor of the weakest party. And a combination of those rogues who defraud the Union, in addition to this sympathy, would be in many cases sufficient to defeat justice. As the juror on the one hand observed the United States, like a fat goose, and a few isolated individuals on the other, it could be very easily guessed on which side he would lean.

Mr. V. concluded by stating, that after examining the bill, he had come to the conclusion that the section in question was the most vital portion of it, and without which, it would be perfectly nugatory.

Mr. MONROE had no doubt that honest merchants were injured by frauds on the revenue, because those who committed the frauds were able to undersell the honest importer at every point. Mr. M. would go any length to have a law passed to enforce the collection of the revenue, but could not take the bill as it now was. He would not consent to this section in any shape, because he believed it infringed the rights of citizens; and was of opinion that a bill could be framed to answer the purpose designed. Mr. M. expressed the hope that the bill would be sent back to the Committee on Manufactures, so that it might mature a bill that would be acceptable to the House. He would rather that all the revenues of the Government should be lost than that this section of the bill should be passed.

The question was further debated by Messrs. MONROE, UNDERWOOD, CURTIS, ADAMS, HOFFMAN, and CRAIG,

When, the question being on striking out the section under debate in the original bill, except the first line, and inserting the amendment, it was carried without a count.

Mr. RHETT then moved to strike out the entire section as amended.

And the question being put, the ayes were 49, the noes 69.

No quorum having voted, a motion was made that the committee rise—on which the ayes were 21, the noes 85.

There still being no quorum,

The committee rose and reported that fact to the House, which thereupon, at 6 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, May 11, 1840.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of Thomas Watkins, praying compensation for losses incurred during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. A. also presented a memorial from citizens of Ohio, praying that the salaries of clerks in the employment of the Government may be reduced; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. A. also presented the memorial of citizens of Georgetown, D. C. praying that Congress may take measures to compel the banks of the District to fulfil their obligations by a resumption of specie payments; which was read, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the law for the licensing of pilots; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STURGEON presented the memorial of citizens of Harrisburg, Pa. praying for the imposition of a duty on foreign silk, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

WILLIAM LYON MACKENZIE.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. NORVELL, requesting the President of the United States to pardon William Lyon Mackenzie, coming up for consideration,

Mr. NORVELL said it gave him much pleasure to state that the President had already exercised the pardoning power in relation to Mr. Mackenzie, and this would supersede the necessity of further action on the resolution. He therefore moved to lay it the table, which was agreed to.

The joint resolution authorizing the printing of the laws relative to naturalization, was read a third time, and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill to authorize the Legislature of the State of Arkansas to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that State;

The bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under three several treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due to the United States;

The bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefits of the act granting pre-emption rights, which was approved on the 19th June, 1834;

The bill for the relief of the Plumb Island Bridge and Turnpike Company;

The bill for the relief of Samuel Collins; and

The bill to grant to the States and incorporated companies engaged in the construction of roads and canals, the right of way through the public lands of the United States; were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Hannah Leighton was taken up, and after a very interesting discussion, in which Messrs. PIERCE, KING, WEBSTER, CRITTENDEN, WRIGHT, CALHOUN, BENTON, DIXON, BUCHANAN, HUBBARD, ALLEN, and PRESTON, took part, was ordered to be engrossed—yeas 31, noes 9.

The CHAIR submitted a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the 29th December, in relation to the sale or exchange of Treasury drafts for bank paper, by disbursing officers of the Government.

Mr. BENTON believed that that message was in answer to a call of the Senate, adopted on his motion in December last. He would thank the Secretary to send him the papers. In December last he read in his place here a letter from a gentleman of this District, who was a disbursing agent of the Government, and who had been sent to the Southwest to make large Indian payments.

Mr. WEBSTER begged pardon for interrupting the gentleman; but if the message and documents were to be the subject of remarks, it would be better to have them read

Mr. BENTON. Very good, sir! I mean to make them the subject of remarks, beyond all question. With the leave of the Senate, I will certainly do so.

The papers were then read.

Mr. BENTON continued. The circumstances, he said, under which the call was made that led to these answers in part, was a statement given to him in writing by a citizen of this District, then largely employed as a disbursing agent of the Government. He would read over this statement again, premising that part of what this gentleman stated had been nearly witnessed by himself last summer in the Southwest.

Mr. B. here read the statement, as follows:

"Memorandum of matters relating to the circulation of the United States Bank notes, which came under my own observation while acting as disbursing agent of the Government in the Cherokee country.

"Sometime in the spring of the year 1838, two gentlemen arrived at the Cherokee Agency, (one of whose names I think was Roberts, the other not remembered,) to whom I was introduced. They were said to be agents of the U. S. Bank, whose business appeared to be to exchange the notes of that bank for Treasury drafts, or drafts from the paymasters and disbursing agents on the Government. They did make exchanges to a considerable extent, but to what amount I cannot say. They had, I understood, in their possession a large amount of the notes of the bank, and that they, after leaving the agency, went to Little Rock, Arkansas, on business of a similar character. One of the contractors (now in Washington) for furnishing subsistence to the emigrant Indians West, yesterday told me that an agent of the United States Bank had been at Little Rock, and that he, together with his partners, negotiated a loan with him for $150,000, payable in six months, which, he added, would soon be due."

"In the summer of the same year, I was called upon by Maj. Chas. J. Nourse, of this city, to know if I had any Treasury drafts that I wished cashed, stating that he had old notes of the Bank of the United States that he would give me in exchange. I replied that I had some drafts on New York and other places, which, if he would give me notes of the U. States Bank of Pennsylvania, I would enter into the arrangement, but that otherwise I would not, as I conceived the issue of these notes wrong, and contrary to law, and would not make myself an accessory to the wrong, by circulating them. He observed that the other agents had made no objection to receiving them, and strongly urged my taking them likewise. Finding I was not to be persuaded, we finally made an exchange, he giving me the notes of the Pennsylvania Bank. The old notes were generally of small denomination—tens, twenties; the new notes were mostly of like sums, with some fifties and hundreds. The twenties and hundreds, of the new issue, appeared to have been struck off for post notes, made payable to order, with the word "order" erased, and "John Ross or bearer" inserted. To all appearances Mr. Nourse had a very large amount with him—I think he said, of both kinds, something like a half million of dollars. He also said he thought he should go to Arkansas to endeavor to make exchanges there.

"WASHINGTON, August 20, 1839."

Mr. BENTON observed that the first effort here developed was to push off on the writer the old dead notes of the Bank of the United States; and, that failing, they then push on him the notes of the new Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, which was soon after to close its doors. The contractor who was referred to, and who was then in Washington, stated that the agent of this Bank had been to Little Rock, in Arkansas, and that he and his partners had negotiated a loan with him of 150,000 dollars of these notes, which would soon be due. "The old notes were generally of small denominations,—tens and twenties—and the new notes were mostly of like sums, with some fifties and hundreds." "The twenties and hundreds of the new issue appeared to have been struck off for post notes, made payable to order, with the word order erased, and John Ross, or bearer, inserted." The Senator from Arkansas, as well as himself, was familiar with these notes; all had heard of the Ross notes. "Mr. Nourse had a very large amount with him. I think he said, of both kinds, something like half a million of dollars."

It was upon this statement, given to me by a citizen of Georgetown, one of the most respectable persons in that place—and obliged to be respectable, otherwise he would not have been trusted by the War Department with the large disbursements he was employed to make for the Government—that his resolution, which had just been read to the Senate, was founded. He had, however, a good deal of knowledge of his own on the subject. He had himself been in the Southwest, and he there found that the old dead notes of the Bank of the United States were in extensive circulation, and had been put off on the agents of the Government in the manner stated by this gentleman. He was present in one of our land offices where a citizen came in and offered some of these notes, which were refused by the Receiver. The citizen then expressed great indignation against the Government for putting out notes which it would not take in payment. The contractor's agent, he said, had paid them to him, and they consequently came from the Government. Besides this, it came to his knowledge, Mr. B. said, that in this city of Washington, there was a Treasury draft on the Bank of Missouri, for $90,000, that was sold by one of the disbursing agents of the Government to the agent of the Bank of the United States, and the notes of that institution taken in pay. The person who sold it went off to pay our troops on the Southwestern frontier, and before he had been twenty-four hours out of the city, the news came that the Bank had closed its doors, and the notes therefore were but as so much chaff in the hands of the agent, and to be paid out as Government currency. There was much evidence in his possession. (Mr. B. said) to prove the fact that the Bank of the United States was in the habit of sending out its agents all over the country, pursuing the disbursing agents of the Government, for the purpose of getting their specie drafts, and putting off on them their illegal or depreciated notes, and that of both kinds—the old dead notes which it was made penal by law to circulate, as well as the notes of the new institution, which was about to stop payment. In the Southwest particularly, this game was carried on, and there was good evidence that it was continued at this time.

*These contractors were Glasgow and Harris of Missouri.

It appeared from the statements just read by the Secretary that a great many of the officers of Government, much to their credit, refused to have any thing to do with these notes. The Post Office Department had classified the returns of its officers, and arranged them in a table under three distinct heads in separate columns. The first class consisted of those who had refused to sell or exchange drafts, and to receive these notes at all. The second, of those who had, in some instances, received them; and the third class (a pretty good list of names too) consisted of those who refused to answer at all. They took the stand of the old Bank of the United States in this matter: they would not answer. Here he was pleased to say that the greatest part of the Government agents answered in the negative; but there were others whose answers were not so satisfactory; and here, (said Mr. B.) alluding to the answer of Mr. Gilliss of the Fourth Auditor's office, is an instance where the draft of the Government was sold for these notes three months after the Bank had stopped payment, and paid out as the currency of the Government. The information which he had received, also showed that a person by the name of Roberts was now in the Southwest with immense packages of the Bank of the United States notes; and he had also learned that this person had obtained a list of the Treasury drafts issued here to disbursing agents in the Southwest, and was pursuing the officers of the Government all over the West to purchase these drafts out of their hands. This was the amount of his information, and it was not to be disputed. There was pretty good proof of it here. The Bank of the United States had gone upon this system of making the Government the circulator of her notes—even the old dead ones—and of making them the currency of the Federal Government; and further, to put out both the notes of the old Bank, which it is an offence, under the act of Congress, to circulate, as well as the notes of the new Bank, both before and after it had stopped payment. There was one strong case presented in the statement he had read, and that was that there was a hundred and fifty thousand dollars of these notes sent as far as Arkansas, there to be loaned to a single company of contractors to purchase cattle in the West. It was bad enough, in all conscience, for a bank to lend her notes at her counter, when she was going to stop payment; but to send them out to a distance, for the same purpose, was carrying the matter a little further than he had imagined these institutions would venture to do.

While these things were going on at a distance, the same thing was done a little nearer; say within 100 miles. From the information given him by a citizen, it appeared that a specie draft was sold for paper, and that the difference, which was thirteen hundred dollars, the agent had passed to the credit of the Government. If the agent had received this thirteen hundred dollars, and credited the United States with it, what was it but holding so much from the public creditors? The United States has paid thirteen hundred dollars less than the public creditors were entitled to. The information added, that the Administration lost ground very much by collecting good money and paying out depreciated paper; and in particular it was used as an argument, that the Government could not get along without a Bank of the United States. He, himself, had had it thrown up to him last summer, in the West, that the notes of the Bank of the United States were the best currency; that they were received, every where, by the officers of the Government, and paid out by them. Mr. B. said he thought it was due to the subject to bring it before Congress. He thought it due to the whole question to make an authentic exposition of the fact that the Bank of the United States was systematically sending her agents through the country, carrying her notes along with them; that is, first, the old dead notes, which the law made it penal to circulate; and, secondly, the new notes of the Bank, before and since it had stopped payment; which they put off on the agents of the Government, in as many cases as possible, for their specie drafts; and he farther wished to expose the fact, that this Bank was systematically pursuing the same course at this very time. One of the answers that had been given to the call, made upon his resolution, showed that in this city, almost in the presence of the Government, the Government drafts were sold for the notes of this bank three months after it had stopped. It was no wonder then that the cry was raised of one currency for the office holders, and another for the people.

Mr. B. said he should, for the present, only ask for the printing of these papers. What course it would be proper to take with them, would be a matter of consideration when all the answers came in. One course that which naturally suggested itself, was to refer them to the President of the United States, whose duty it was to see that the officers under him did their duty, in order that the proper remedy might be applied. Whether the Senate would adopt any legislative action or not, would be for them to decide when the proper time arrived. At present he only asked for the printing of the papers.

Mr. WEBSTER said, if he understood the drift of the charge, it was that certain disbursing officers had received specie or specie funds to pay the creditors of the Government, had exchanged these funds for depreciated bank paper, and paid out the depreciated paper to those who were entitled to receive specie or its equivalent. If this was a fact, it was a singular comment on the present state of the currency; and if persons in the employment of the Government had conducted themselves in this manner, instead of denouncing the banks for endeavoring to get specie or Government drafts for their depreciated paper, we should inquire into the conduct of our disbursing agents, over whom we have some control, and see if their conduct has been perfectly correct in the premises.

Mr. SEVIER observed that there was one case only presented in the papers just read to the Senate, which made it necessary for him to say any thing in relation to the subject under consideration, and that was the case of the $90,000 draft, sold last summer by Col. Rector. Now, he had received a letter from this disbursing officer, when the call was made last summer, and the facts of the case were these: When this gentleman was here last summer, the Bank of the United States was paying specie for its notes, and every body believed that the paper of that Bank was as good as specie. Under these circumstances, he got the permission of Col. Towson himself, predicated upon the request of the officers who were to be paid by him, to exchange the draft received from the Government for United States Bank notes. It was true, as the Senator from Missouri said, that, after he got these notes the Bank stopped payment; but he made the exchange while the Bank was a specie paying bank, and got the permission of the Paymaster General and the Secretary of War for it. Now with regard to Roberts: The contractors seem to have obtained a loan from Roberts himself, as they had a right to do, and he received his pay from them after the appropriation passed. It was true that Roberts was out in the Southwest exchanging bank notes for specie and Government drafts, and, whether the notes were good or bad, those who took them were the best judge; but the Government was no ways to blame for this, as those who made the exchanges had an undoubted right to do so.

Mr. BENTON remarked that the Senator from Arkansas had entirely mistaken his whole movement. He very seldom advanced to individuals at all, and had no intention of doing so on the present occasion. There was no person more careful in mentioning the names of individuals, or more cautious of calling any body before the Senate, than himself; and in every thing he said, he thought he was careful to avoid names not before the Senate. With respect to the $90,000 draft, he made a special statement that, on the 7th day of October, 1839, the agent of the Bank of the United States bought it from the disbursing officer of the Government, and that, on the 8th or 9th day of the same month, the Bank stopped. Yes, on the very instant of their stopping, $90,000 of their notes had been put off on an officer of the Government, who was on his way to the West, where they were disbursed as Government currency. On the 18th day of October, this $90,000 was rolled out of the bank at St. Louis, shipped to Philadelphia, from whence it went to London, while its dishonored notes were paid out by our officers. That was one case out of many others, and he had no doubt but the answers that were yet to come in would present others equally as strong. This was a case in which depreciated paper was put off on a Government officer, drawing from us, in place of it, our hard money, and thus authorizing the enemies of the Administration to say that it had failed to pay specie for its engagements, and adopted the United States Bank notes. How failed? Because the Bank was enabled, by sending out its agents, to get the specie from the Government officers, and send it to London. That was the reason why the Government failed in the instances he had cited, and he was now able to prove it. The Bank agents were carrying millions of her paper through the country, getting specie drafts for it out of hands of the agents and officers of the Government, and drawing the specie for them, which was immediately shipped to London. Those facts would be brought out and proved in such a way that it would be impossible to deny them.

There was no person, he repeated, more careful than he was of bringing the names of individuals before the Senate. He purposely avoided mentioning Mr. Rector's name at all. Doubtless this gentleman's answer would come in with the others; and the part that he had acted would be fully explained. He knew he was not to blame; he knew (Mr. B said) that it would disclose the fact he had stated. But what had this to do with the point he wished to bring to the notice of the Senate—the conduct of the Bank? He had stated that the day before the Bank stopped, one of its agents got out of the hands of an officer of the Government a Treasury draft for $90,000, and paid him in notes of a bank which was to stop the next day. Our officers (said Mr. B) are trailed by the agents of this Bank, who, in one respect, are superior to the Cuba bloodhounds, which had been found useless in Florida, because they would not take the trail at all. They not only (said Mr. B.) take the trail with wonderful sagacity, but they hold on after they have caught the game—they never let go their hold till they have got the Treasury draft, if it can be had. You will have (said Mr. B.) proof upon proof of what I have said. You will have it from the South west, the great field where the Bank of the United States carried on its operations, and where it undertook to make the people believe that she furnished the best currency for the Government, that she upheld the Federal Government, and that the Federal Government could not get along without her.

It was upon this state of things that the charges he had referred to were made against the Government—and it was upon the information thus obtained that he had made the call which brought in the answers that had just been read to the Senate. But the great point he made was, not to criminate individuals, but to lay bare the conduct of this Bank before the public eye. It was to show that this Bank, ever since it obtained its new charter, had been assiduously engaged, first, in endeavoring to show that she upholds the credit of the Government; secondly, in endeavoring to pass off her old dead notes, and in the third place, to pass off the notes of the new Bank after it had stopped payment. And further, that this Bank, differing from other banks that loaned out money at their counters, sent their notes a long way off by their agents, to loan to contractors and others, and after all this the Government was to be taunted with the charge that it had failed to pay specie for its engagements—that its hard money was a humbug, and that it could not do without a Bank of the United States, whose currency it adopted. All this was done by a bank whose stock, though not worth five cents in the dollar to keep, furnished a currency for the American people, and that too in exchange for gold and silver, obtained from Government agents; and which, although she would pay her English stockholders well, would probably never pay her American stockholders a dollar.

Mr. HENDERSON said that it appeared by some of the replies, that notes of other non-specie paying banks, in addition to the United States Bank, had been received by the officers of Government, and argued to show that even the notes of specie paying banks at a distance, or disadvantageously situated, were not equivalent to specie or specie funds at the place of payment.

Mr. SEVIER had only a word to say. He was sorry that his remarks were misunderstood. He had said that in the first case referred to, the individual had sold a Government draft for what he considered equal to specie, and this was done with the assent of those who had authority to give it. If the Bank afterwards broke faith with her creditors and stopped payment, that could not be charged as a crime upon him. With regard to the great amount of notes of the United States Bank now in circulation on our Southwestern border, the Government was not in fault. The agent of the Bank, Mr. Roberts, takes out immense amounts in notes of the Bank; he loans them to those who have contracted to supply the Government troops with provisions, or perform any other service; these contractors pay them out to the farmers or drovers for their corn or their cattle, and thus they get into circulation. When the contractor receives his pay from the Government, in Treasury notes or a specie draft, he hands it over to the agent of the Bank, in repayment of his loan, and the specie is drawn on account of the Bank, and she sends it where she pleases. Can the Government prevent this result, or is she to blame for its occurrence? He knew that there were several agents of the Bank on the borders of Missouri and Arkansas, indeed there might be one in every Indian tribe, for aught he knew, who took every occasion to exchange their notes for Treasury drafts; but this was not a matter for which the Government was responsible. He contended that the Government had done its duty, and in every instance had paid out the currency of the Constitution.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, as an additional reason for the amount of the notes of the United States Bank in circulation in the Southwest, adverted to the arrangement entered into with that bank by the Secretary of War, by which one of the bonds of the Bank to the Government was discharged in disbursements to the creditors of the Government, which disbursements were to be made in notes of the institution. Mr. C. said he knew nothing of the facts alluded to by the gentlemen who preceded him, but he would say that if the agent of the Bank of the United States, or any other bank, had exchanged their notes for Government drafts, with a suspension of payments in contemplation, it was a most disgraceful fraud.

Mr. BENTON replied, that the draft was dated on the seventh of October, and the Bank stopped on the eighth or the ninth. The draft was sold in this place, one Government officer having been waylaid for the purpose of putting these notes on him. He took them as the notes of a specie paying bank, and the next day the Bank stopped payment. On the eighteenth of the same month, the specie for this draft was rolled out from the Bank of Missouri, in St. Louis, and shipped to Philadelphia, from whence it was carried to London, and the notes of the United States Bank paid to our creditors. With respect to the agreement of which the Senator from Kentucky spoke, the information which he had read just now, showed that there had been three violations of it. The first was the Bank paying out the old dead notes of the old Bank, which was an offence against our laws. The second violation was their having paid notes under twenty dollars; and the third violation was their having paid out post notes or "Ross notes," as they were called in the Southwest. But the Senator from Arkansas, it seemed, could not take the point which he had made.

He had not arraigned any officer here. When all the information came in, he should move to lay it before the President of the United States, in order that he might examine it, and see if any remedy could be applied. His object further was, that it should be examined in the Senate, that they might judge whether any legislative action was necessary. With respect to the officers and contractors, he had not a word to say, at the present time. He would not put them to the trouble of making any explanations. He would not name them here. He was aware that Mr. Rector, before he had made his arrangement, had obtained the permission of his immediate chief. He did not mention Mr. Rector's name, nor did he mean to do it. His great object was to show that we have been paying out the paper of broken banks, received in exchange for specie; and that the charge was, in consequence, made, in the Southwest that the Government could not do without them, and that it was notorious that the notes of this broken Bank had furnished a currency for this General Government.

They say the attempt to pay specie had failed. Now he wished to know if it took any more trouble to pay out the hard money to our creditors than to ship it off to London. His declaration was, that the agents of this Bank trailed and waylaid the Government officers, even across the Mississippi, and getting their specie drafts from them, shipped it off to the bank, and thence to London. When he was in the Southwest last fall, it was in vain for him to say that the Government was innocent of all this, for the people, seeing the immense circulation of these notes, and that they were paid out by our agents, contractors, and officers, naturally supposed they came from the Government. That determined him to get this information; and when the facts all came in, the charges he had made would be fixed on the Bank so firmly that it would be impossible for them to deny it. It would be seen that she had made the United States the circulater of her notes, and even those which it was illegal to circulate.

Mr. WEBSTER said that the statement admitted the extraordinary imbecility of the Government. It admitted that the attempt to establish a specie circulation had failed, and failed through the energy and address of a State institution. It acknowledged that the Government only played second fiddle to this corporation in the commercial and fiscal affairs of the country. He contended that it was utterly impossible, in the nature of things, for the Government to maintain specie payments, while the great mass of the circulation was composed of depreciated bank paper, and went into details to show how an attempt to do so must inevitably fail. He said that while the Senator from Missouri had been loud in his denunciations of a State corporation, over which we had no control, for doing that which we had no power to prevent, he had entirely overlooked the officers of the Government who had participated in the offence, and who were within the reach of legislative or Executive action.

Mr. BENTON observed that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] said that he (Mr. B.) overlooked the petty delinquencies of the officers of the Government while he poured out the vials of his wrath on the head of the Bank of the United States. Now he stated to the Senate, and he belived several times over, that these papers would go to the President of the United States, whose duty it was to see that his officers did their duty, and that he would examine them, and seeing the conduct of each officer in each particular case, would apply the proper remedy if found necessary. That was one course he proposed to take. Another was, when all the answers came in, to make them the subject of some legislative action on the part of the Senate; but he disclaimed now, when the information was only received in part, any intention of dragging the Government officers before the Senate, or of saying one word about them, or naming one of them. He had, however, distinctly stated that either upon his motion or that of some other Senator, all this information would be referred to the President for his action, and that it would become his duty as one bound to see the laws of the country faithfully executed, to apply the proper remedy.

Now, so far from this information proving that the attempt to pay the engagements of the Government in hard money had failed, he undertook to say that the contrary was proved by it, and that from this time forth, the practice would be established. By the time that all the officers had answered all the questions propounded to them, it would be in the power of the Government to have in its service none but such as would fulfil the laws of the country, and those who would obey the instructions of the Government. We have yet to be made acquainted with something new under the sun, when we learn that it would take more money to pay the creditors of the Government in hard money, than it would take to pay the hard money over to the Bank of the United States. He admitted that other Government officers paid over the money in the first instance; those who received it had a right do with it as they pleased. As to contractors, they stood in a relation a little different, and not very different from that of Government officers, and it might be, that in consequence of disclosures now made, a clause would be inserted in future contracts, requiring contractors to pay out the hard money they received from the Government. But we all, said Mr. B. see the effect that this state of things has upon the character of the Administration, and the injury it does to the country. We see that having collected hard money, it is paid out in a depreciated currency, and even in United States Bank notes. The time, however, had come to apply the remedy. We are now receiving information on the subject, and when it all came in, it would be time to act.

Mr. SEVIER would only say that he did not believe that there ever had been a payment made by the Government except in specie or its equivalent, and was convinced that the Government had, in every instance, fulfilled its obligations.

The question was then taken on printing the document, and it was agreed to.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, May 11, 1840.

Mr. CRABB asked permission of the House to offer a resolution; which was read for information, and which proposed to change the hour of meeting from 12 to 11 o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania asked permission to amend the resolution, so as to take a recess from 2½ to 4 o'clock; and

Mr. DAWSON also gave notice that, should the rules be suspended, he would move an amendment proposing, by the concurrence of the Senate, to adjourn Congress on the 15th of June next.

Mr. EVANS objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. CRABB read the new rule relating to adjournments; which rule says that a motion to adjourn, and to fix a day to adjourn, shall always be in order, and inquired of the SPEAKER whether it was not in order to receive the resolution, notwithstanding the objection.

The SPEAKER decided not.

Mr. CRABB then moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. CRAIG demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question having been taken on the motion to suspend the rules, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 23.

So the resolution was received; and, having been read,

Mr. TURNEY moved the previous question on its adoption, which motion having received a second, the main question was ordered and put, and the resolution was agreed to.

The CHAIR announced that the business before the House was the special order on the report of the Select Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. ADAMS said, as that was the subject first in order, he would move to take up the unfinished business of Saturday. The chairman of Ways and Means had been so good as to allow the bill to be made the special order for one day, during which he was absent; he hoped he would consent that it should be made the special order for another day, now that he was in the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked the consent of the House to offer a resolution; which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform this House how many officers of the navy are absent on leave or on furlough, including passed midshipmen, giving the name of each officer, the cause of his absence, the length of time he or they have been absent or excused from service. If furloughed, when does the leave granted expire, what length of time have those furloughed served, or been at sea at any one time for the last twenty years; what business have the absent officers been engaged in during the absence on leave, or furlough, and how often has the leave or furlough been renewed to any individual named as now absent.

There being no objection to the resolution, it was received, read, and agreed to.

Mr. R. GARLAND, by permission, presented further testimony in relation to a case pending before a committee.

Mr. JENIFER submitted a memorial and documents from the tobacco convention; which were, on his motion, ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. made a motion to have an extra quantity of said memorial and documents printed; which motion, under the rule, lies on the table for one day.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, the house then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BELL in the chair) on the bill reported from the Committee on Manufactures, "to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports."

The question pending when the committee rose on Saturday, was the motion of Mr. RHETT to strike from the bill the ninth section in the words following:

"And be it further enacted, That whenever a suit against any collector, or other officer of the customs, for the seizure of goods, wares, or merchandise, unlawfully imported into the United States, or forfeited for the unlawful entry of the same, shall be tried in any court of the United States, in which suit is involved any question of duties on importations of goods, wares, or merchandise, no person having the same interest with that of the party to the suit in the question at issue shall be competent as a witness on such trial, unless called to testify by the adverse party.

The question was taken by tellers, (Messrs CRABB and CRAIG acting as such) and decided in the negative by—ayes 62, noes 83.

Mr. RHETT moved to amend the tenth section of the bill by striking out that part of the penalty in case a custom-house officer should aid or abet any person to commit a fraud on the revenue, which says that they "shall be thereafter incapable of holding any office of profit or trust under the United States." Mr. R. considered it improper for Congress to legislate on that subject, as the Constitution already provided for such cases.

Mr. TILLINGHAST was of a different opinion. He considered there was nothing in the bill, as amended, which, on careful examination, would be found at variance to any of the great principles of the Constitution. It was true that the Constitution prescribes the qualification of officers of the Government; it also prescribed that they should be disqualified for offences against the laws. It gives the power to Congress to legislate for such offences against the laws, and to prescribe the crimes which go to disqualify. The disability to hold office has been recognised as proper penalties, in other legislation, for crimes or violations of law. The constitutional power of Congress to disqualify an individual from holding office for offences against United States."

the laws, had never been heretofore disputed. In the revenue law of 1799, the disability to hold office is made a part of the penalty for committing offence against the law.

Mr. ADAMS said that so far from it being unconstitutional for Congress to legislate on this matter, it was expressly authorized by the Constitution so to do. The Constitution gives the sole power to the Senate to try all impeachments; and it expressly says that "judgments in cases of impeachment shall not extend farther than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit, under the

Mr. A. argued that the power was left to Congress to specify what particular crimes shall disqualify an individual from holding office; and that was what the bill before the House proposed to do, and nothing more. After pursuing this argument to some extent in support of the position he assumed, Mr. A. said he considered a breach of trust in an officer as an infamous crime, and which deserved the severest punishment. The punishment proposed operated on the mind; it brought infamy and disgrace, and was, therefore, a very proper punishment.

Mr. CUSHING wished to inquire of his colleague whether the bill had any reference to the bribes which he was informed it was the practice of the custom-house officers in New York to receive from importers and others. If he was wrong, he would be glad to be corrected; but he had been informed that such was the open practice for sums of money to be given to these subordinate officers by importers and merchants for preference over others in receiving their papers, etc. For instance, it frequently happened that ten or twelve gentlemen received their consignments by a particular ship, and it was then a matter of competition as to who should receive his papers first. So the clerk sometimes received a fee or bribe of $50 or $100, to give one the preference over another. Again: a half dozen ships might come in on the same day, when the passengers, necessarily finding delay in getting their papers, would pay the same bribes to receive their papers before others. It might also occur that some passengers might pay a bribe to the officers for the purpose of getting their baggage through with an easy inspection, or without any inspection at all. Any one who had been to Europe, must be aware of the shameful system prevailing among custom-house officers abroad, who not only received bribes for giving preference, but bribes for the performance of their duty.

He stated these facts alleged in relation to the custom-house at New York, with the hope that, if true, they would be marked, and a proper remedy provided. He held it wrong for those officers to receive any such fees, as it opened the door to corruption, inasmuch as it habituated them to the reception of money which they had no right to receive. He denied that any custom-house officer had a right to receive money, other than his salary, even in the shape of presents, to urge him to the more prompt performance of his duty. His pay from Government was a sufficient reward. If any officer received money over and above his salary, for the performance of his duty, it was bribery, and deserved punishment. If the amendment did not reach this class of cases, he would offer an amendment which should reach them.

He stated this on common rumor, as what was believed to be a system very extensively practised. He did not intend to make any imputation on the collector himself, as he had no reason to believe that he was a party to them. On the contrary, he knew that the collector had discharged several indididuals who had been guilty of receiving such bribes, and for doing which, he had been severely censured by the New York papers.

Mr. VANDERPOEL suggested whether the word "otherwise" in the 7th line, did not apply to such cases.

Mr. CUSHING said it did not, but applied solely to bribes, with intention to defraud the revenue. These fees were not given with any intention to defraud, but still they were bribes, and calculated to produce a very injurious effect.

Mr. ADAMS replied that the evils of which his colleague complained was of an entirely different nature to those which the bill intended to remedy. The practice of officers receiving bribes for the giving of preference in the performance of their duty, was not defrauding the revenue, and therefore could not be relevant to the present measure. He suggested to his colleague whether he was prepared to act upon mere rumor, and newspaper charges, against these subordinates. But in case it were proved to be the case, would it not be much better to provide a remedy in another bill, and at another time?

Mr. FILLMORE spoke at some length on the nature of the power given by the Constitution to Congress. He agreed that if we did possess this power of punishing a certain class of officers, it would be very proper to exercise it But the danger was, if we did not possess the power, and yet presumed to exercise it, that at some future time it might be extended to cases where it ought not to be applied.

Mr. CRABB was fully disposed to punish every officer who should be guilty of such crimes. But, at the same time, he must have due regard to the Constitution. He did not believe that we had the power of adding to the qualification or disqualification of any officer, when the qualifications and disqualifications of officers were designated by the Constitution. But as to any petty officer, which this Congress had power to create by law, he thought we had the power to designate what their qualifications or disqualifications should be, and to provide any punishment we might think proper. But as that clause applied to every officer, whether appointed by the Constitution or by the law of Congress, he could not vote for it. He therefore moved to amend by inserting, after the words United States, the words "created by the authority of Congress."

The question being taken on this amendment, it was rejected.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. RHETT, to strike out the words "and shall be thereafter disqualified from holding any office of trust under the United States," after some brief remarks from that gentleman and Mr. BRIGGS, it was rejected—ayes 48, noes 82.

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend by striking out after the 27th line, the word "double:" agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to amend by inserting in the 18th line after the words "custom-house," the words, "with intent to defraud the revenue."

This was objected to on the ground that it would go to legalize the practice complained of by Mr. CUSHING, inasmuch as the penalty would apply only to such cases of bribery as contemplated a fraud on the revenue.

The question being taken on this amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. CUSHING then offered the following amendment, to be added to the 11th section:

"And be it further enacted, If any collector, naval officer, surveyor, or deputy, or any other custom-house officer, or person employed in the custom-house, or in the collection of the revenue, shall, for the performance of any of the duties of his office, or for giving preference, favor, or despatch, in the performance of the same, directly or indirectly, receive from any person any money, or other thing of value, other than his legal compensation, he shall, on conviction thereof, pay a fine of not less than one hundred, nor more than one thousand dollars, for each and every such offence."

Mr. TILLINGHAST though the section they had just passed upon covered the same ground taken by the amendment

Mr. CUSHING contended that it did not, but had reference only to such cases where bribes were received with a view to defraud the revenue.

Mr. HAND made some remarks, in which he disapproved the course of gentlemen in making these general charges upon mere rumor.

Mr. CUSHING replied, that what he had alluded to was spoken of as a matter of notoriety among commercial men in New York.

Mr. HAND thought it would be better not to charge the merchants, as a class, with giving these bribes, and being guilty of such crimes, without satisfactory proof.

Mr. MONROE said his colleague appeared to think there was something very corrupt in the practice of giving fees to the clerks. For his part he did not see any thing which affected the morals either of the clerk or merchant. However exceptionable the practice might be, there was nothing corrupt about it It was well known that, in the regular course of business, merchants had to wait a long time for their papers, and it was an open practice to give a fee to the clerks for expediting the business, who, in doing it, probably worked extra hours.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the amendment by adding the words, "one half of the penalty to be paid to the person giving information thereof."

Mr. P. advocated his amendment, on the ground that it would be in vain to hope for a proper execution of the law without some such inducement.

After some brief remarks from Mr. HAND,

Mr. WISE said, as it appeared witnesses were wanted to prove the fact in relation to these fees or bribes, he would give some information on the subject. He would tell them that when he was in New York on the Swartwout committee, merchants of both parties, men of high character, came to him and complained that they were compelled to do it. Yes; owing to the practice which had grown up, the merchants assured him that they not only had to pay temporary fees, but regular salaries to these officers per annum for getting their business transacted, although they were paid by the Government. These merchants were gentlemen of high standing in the city of New York, and they stated that the practice was by no means clandestine, but done openly, and that it was impossible to get along without it. Such was the hight of corruption, that the clerks in the custom house would not do their duty without it. He stated, on his own personal veracity, that upwards of a dozen merchants had complained to him of the practice.

Mr. HAND said if such was really the state of the facts, and that the intelligent merchants of New York had submitted to it so long, he could only express his utter astonishment. And he was sure the people of the United States would be equally astonished that these merchants had suffered it to grow up into general practice. As such, it appeared, was the case, the merchants were equally guilty, with the officers, and he would no longer defend them. He thought it high time there was some law on the subject.

Mr. WISE explained that the merchants complained of the system as an extortion which they dare not resist, owing to the extent to which it was practised.

Mr. HAND said that the merchants of New York were shrewd business men, and must know such a practice could not be sanctioned by law. If they chose to submit to the extortion, all he had to say was, that they were fools for so doing.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said if such was the practice, it had long prevailed. He did not believe with his colleague [Mr. HAND] that the merchants were to blame, because they had taken means to obtain their perishable commodities in advance of others, for a small consideration. He would, however, cheerfully vote for the amendment, without considering it was fixing any imputation on the merchants of New York.

Mr. SERGEANT sugggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] that there was already a law making provision for an informant. He hoped the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr CUSHING] would be agreed to. The practice complained of in some of the custom-houses was the germ of bribery, and, without restraint, would grow to great height and great strength. This amendment, in his opinion, would have a salutary effect.

The question being taken on Mr. PETRIKIN'S amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS was willing to accept the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. CUSHING,] because its tendency was to arrest the evil complained of as soon as possible. He would be glad if his colleague would take up the subject of his (Mr. C's) amendment to the fullest extent, and offer a bill to the House which would not only operate on clerks who receive $500 a year, but on the highest men in the Union, in the Executive and Legislative departments, as well as on custom-house officers.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia expressed his regret and astonishment, not only at the extraordinary developments which had been made on that floor, but at the remarks made in relation to them by gentlemen of both parties, by way of extenuating and narrowing down the gross crimes of bribery and corruption. What did we see? Why, it appeared that we had a system of open bribery and corruption among our custom-house officers, and that pay was received for favoritism, the same as in Europe. If such things were allowed, no man in this Congress need be surprised if the very state of things existing in foreign countries, should soon be advocated here. Would they pass a law for the punishment of these Yorkshire traders, and not punish their own salaried officers for receiving bribes? The very same principle would apply to both.

Mr. McKAY did not approve the practice of paying fees to any salaried officer. He hoped it did not exist to the extent as was imagined. His object in rising was to remind gentlemen, that some years ago a requisition had been issued from the Treasury expressly forbidding any such practice, and that being the case, he was disposed to think the evil could not exist so extensively as some gentlemen were inclined to believe.

After some further debate, in which Messrs. PETRIKIN,

HAND, and CUSHING participated, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. CUSHING, and it was agreed to.

Sundry other amendments were proposed by Messrs. HOFFMAN and FILLMORE, which were rejected; and by Messrs. ADAMS and TILLINGHAST, which were agreed to; and upon which an explanatory debate took place, in which Messrs. ADAMS, HABERSHAM, TILLINGHAST, SERGEANT, HOFFMAN, FILLMORE, and LINCOLN, participated.

At a quarter past six o'clock, the bill was reported to the House.

Mr. HOLMES gave notice of his intention to address the House generally on the bill. He characterized it as one pregnant with all evils; one most enormous in its character; which he should endeavor to expose to the House, if no gentleman more alert than himself should obtain the floor, and move the previous question.

On motion of Mr. LEADBETTER, the bill and amendments (as made in Committee of the Whole) were ordered to be printed.

And then the House adjourned.

Also, the petition of a number of citizens of Rankin county, Missouri, praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Also, the petition of David A. Brocket; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of Lot Stricklin; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MOUTON presented the memorial of the Trustees of the Caddo Academy, in the State of Louisiana, praying a donation of land; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the War Department to make experiments in steam vessels for harbor defence; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the following resolution, which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making a grant of money or land to the State of New York, to assist in the construction of a railroad between the waters of Lakes Ontario and Champlain, and parallel with the St. Lawrence river; and also to ascertain how far the said road will facilitate the transportation of the mails, public stores, troops, and munitions of war, and how far it will supersede the necessity of forts and other military defences along the St. Lawrence frontier.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating five hundred dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Secretaries of War and Navy, for the purpose of preserving and arranging, for inspection and reference, the mineral and geological specimens belonging to Government.

The bill to authorize the Legislature of the State of Arkansas to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that State;

The bill for the relief of the Plumb Island Bridge and Turnpike Company;

The bill for the relief of Samuel Collins;

The bill to grant to the States and incorporated companies engrged in the construction of roads and canals, the right of way through the public lands of the United States; and were read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of Hannah Leighton;

GENERAL ORDERS.

The bill authorizing the granting of letters testamentary and of administration to aliens in the District of Columbia; and

The bill for the relief of certain companies of Michigan militia; were considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States being taken up,

Mr. WALL addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill, and in favor of the substitute proposed by the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAYTON followed in reply; and

Mr. CRITTENDEN intimating an intention to speak on the subject,

The Senate went into Executive session,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, May 12, 1840.

Mr. DAVIES of Pennsylvania asked permission of the House to offer a resolution proposing to take a daily recess from the hour of 2½ till 4 o'clock.

Mr. EVERETT objected to its reception.

Mr. DAVIS moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to present the resolution, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. LINCOLN said it was obvious that there was no quorum present; he therefore moved a call of the House. He wished to see what number of the gentlemen, who voted that the House should meet at 11 o'clock, were now present.

The call having been ordered, it was proceeded in, and ninety-three members answered to their names. The list of absentees was then called over, and one hundred and thirty answered to their names.

Mr. R. GARLAND said he would like to have the names of the absentees read, that the House might be able to know what number of the gentlemen who had voted that the House should meet at 11 o'clock were now present.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

The question recurring on the motion to suspend the rules, to admit the resolution of Mr. DAVIES, it was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 81, nays 60.

So the rules were not suspended.

The SPEAKER, by permission, laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Secretary of State, in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of March last, calling for the correspondence between the Department of State and the diplomatic functionaries of the United States in France, Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia, and with those Governments, or either of them, relating to the surrender to the Government of the United States of persons charged with piracy and murder on board of the United States schooner Plattsburg, in the year 1817; also, the correspondence relating to the demand by the Charge d'Affaires of Great Britain for the surrender of a mutineer in the British armed ship Lee, in 1819.

Mr. ADAMS moved that it lie on the table and be printed; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. A. said it was a very important document, involving questions of great moment. It was a collection of documents relating to the demand on this Government; and by this Government on other nations. It also contained the correspondence which had taken place in relation to the subject heretofore; also a letter from the Attorney General on the subject, which was of importance to the States. Mr. A. had received a communication from the Governor of Virginia, requesting particularly a copy of it when published, as it involved considerations of a nature extending throughout the Union. He hoped the House would consent to print an extra number. He therefore moved that 5000 copies extra be printed.

The CHAIR said, by the rules of the House, the motion to print an extra number of copies would lie over one day; but if there was no objection, the question could be taken now.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky objected.

Mr. ADAMS moved to suspend the rules to enable him to make the motion; and the House having been divided on that question there were—yeas 83, noes 38. No quorum having voted,

Mr. CUSHING demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 87, nays 67. So the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the vote by which the communication was laid on the table, was reconsidered.

Mr. ADAMS then moved that the communication be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The question having been taken on the first motion for reference, it was decided in the negative.

The question having recurred on the motion to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the documents which had been heretofore transmitted to the House, relating to the Amistad vessel, which was laid on the table, was taken therefrom and referred to the same committee.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department in relation to the Georgia claims for military services; which, on motion of Mr. DAWSON, was referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Also laid before the House a communication from the War Deparment in relation to the charges against Lieut. Dancey; which, on motion of Mr. DOWNING, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department in relation to a dry dock at Pensacola; which was, on motion of Mr. DOWNING, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. JENIFER, the motion made by him on yesterday, to print 5,000 copies extra of the memorial and proceedings of the Convention on Tobacco, was taken up, and agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina asked leave to report from the Committee of Elections a resolution empowering that committee to have such portions of the testimony in relation to the contested elections referred to the committee printed, as they deemed proper. Mr. C. said there was a great mass of testimony before that committee, and the printing of it, under the discretion of the committee, was absolutely necessary to facilitate the action of the committee upon it, and the action of the House when a report shall have been made by the committee.

Mr. STANLY objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. FILLMORE said it was a matter of economy that the resolution should be adopted; and absolutely necessary to facilitate action on the question before the committee, and equally necessary for the information of the House, when it shall be called to act upon the question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. ANDREWS demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the rules were suspended

Mr. R. GARLAND objected to conferring the power on the committee to decide what should be printed. They ought not to be the judges, but the House. He hoped all the testimony would be printed, if any of it was to be.

Mr. CAMPBELL said all the testimony which could be deemed necessary by any member of the committee would be printed.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to strike out the words such evidence, and insert "all the evidence."

Mr. TOLAND hoped the amendment would prevail. He had no objection to print all the testimony; but he was not prepared to give to the Committee of Elections the power of selection. As a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania—a State which had a deep interest in one of these cases—he wished the cases to be fully considered, and all the testimony to be made known. And he wished the House to make its own selection and decision.

Mr. FILLMORE said a mass of tastimony had been referred to that committee; much of it might be irrelevant and incompetent, and it would be incurring an expense to no purpose to have that mass printed. He had no objection, if the House thought proper, to have the whole of it printed; but it would incur an enormous expense.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina accepted the amendment.

The CHAIR stated that it would then leave it discretionary with the committee.

Mr. R. GARLAND wished it so amended as to have the whole of the testimony printed, leaving no discretion to the committee.

Mr. RAMSEY was in favor of giving the committee the power asked, and if the House should, thereafter, deem it necessary, and wish to have the whole printed, it could do so. He, therefore, to save the time of the House, moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. TOLAND demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment; which having been ordered,

Mr. GARLAND said, inasmuch as any one member of the committee could call for and have such portions of the testimony printed, as might by him be thought proper, he withdrew his amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS then called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked leave to present a resolution in substance, that the House would, at half past two, adjourn, for the purpose of accompanying the select committee on Raub's steam safety valve, down the river, to witness the practical operation of the said preventive against explosions.

The CHAIR said the resolution could not be received except by the general consent of the House; and Objections having been made, the resolution was not passed.

The CHAIR said that the first business before the House was the special order on the subject of the public printing.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the House first take up and dispose of the bill to insure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports.

Mr. BLACK said he had no objection to the immediate disposal of that bill; but he wished to state to the House that he was ready at all times to take up the question on printing, and dispose of it.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved that the further consideration of the report be postponed until to-morrow.

After some conversation, further action on the said report was suspended until the bill above alluded to should have been disposed of.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House took up the bill, reported yesterday with sundry amendments from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, entitled "A bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports;" the question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their various amendments.

Mr. EVANS asked that, by general consent, he might offer an amendment which he had been instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move, and which was as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That, in all appraisements and invoices, the mark-banco of Hamburg shall be estimated and taken to be the value of thirty-five and one-half cents."

Mr. ANDREWS inquired if the bill was now up before the House?

The SPEAKER said it was.

Mr. ANDREWS moved the previous question, but withdrew the motion.

Mr. A. objected to the introduction of the amendment, because it was a totally different subject from that of the bill, and ought to be brought up in a proper form. He felt all disposition to accommodate the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Committee of Ways and Means, but he must object to the introduction of the amendment as a tack to this bill.

The SPEAKER said that the amendment, not having been offered in Committee of the Whole, could only be offered now by general consent.

Mr. EVANS was understood to say that he had felt a desire to say a few words on the amendment, but that he would not now press it.

And thereupon all the amendments made in Committee of the Whole were read; and the question being on concurring in them seriatim—

Mr. ADAMS suggested that, by general consent, the question should be taken on all the amendments together, unless any one of them should be objected to, in which case it should be reserved for special action.

And the House having agreed to adopt this course, the question was taken, and all the amendments were concurred in save the one hereinafter mentioned, viz:

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS the ninth section of the bill, which had been amended to read as follows, was excepted:

"SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever a suit against any collector or other officer of the customs, for the seizure of goods, wares, or merchandise, unlawfully imported into the United States, or forfeited for the unlawful entry of the same, shall be tried in any court of the United States, in which suit is involved any question of duties on importations of goods, wares, or merchandise, no person having the same interest with that of the party to the suit, in the question at issue, shall be competent as a witness on such trial, unless called to testify by the adverse party."

And the question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole—

Some conversation followed on a question of order, involving inquiries as to the last process by which this amendment could be finally reached, and in which Mr. SPEAKER and Messrs. ANDREWS, FILLMORE, RHETT, PETRIKIN, ADAMS, EVERETT, and CRAIG, participated.

After which (a demand made by Mr. PETRIKIN for the previous question having been rejected) the question was taken, and the amendment to the section was concurred in.

And the question then recurring on agreeing to the section as amended,

Mr. FILLMORE moved to strike out the same.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee called for the reading of the section; which having been read—

Mr. ADAMS had a single word to say. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] in opposing this section, had argued as if the word "similar," instead of "same" (interest) had been introduced into the bill; and much of his argument had been based on the substitution of the former word or the latter; and even the Reporters for the National Intelligencer, who were generally very correct in their reports, had, in the paper issued this morning, taken up the expression used by the gentleman from South Carolina, as though it were the expression contained in the bill. The words of the section were, that "no person having the same interest with that of the party to the suit," should be competent as a witness, etc. Every member would see the difference between same and similar. A similar interest was one thing—the same interest was another.

Mr. A. was understood to add that this was the very point which he had met in Committee of the Whole. He wished to have the section perfectly understood by the House and the country. The bill did not propose to disqualify a person having a similar interest. The words were, having "the same interest." And he wished the Reporters of the Intelligencer particularly to take notice of this, and that the Editors of that paper should correct the statement in their publication of this day, by which the bill was represented as excluding persons having a similar, and not the same interest.

Mr. HOLMES addressed the House at much length in opposition to the principles and general features of the bill. He denounced it as fraught with incalculable evils. In the course of his remarks, (which will appear hereafter,) he contended that it was one of the most extraordinary measures ever introduced into the House, and was calculated to benefit the manufacturing at the expense of the commercial interests of the country. Also, that the whole thing was based on a system of tariff, which would expire in two years. He went on to show the consequences which must result from the adoption of so harassing a system at our Northern custom-houses, and contended that it would have the effect of driving the business to Texas and other Southern ports, from whence foreign merchandise would be smuggled through the country, in spite of all the Government could do to prevent it. It was therefore, in his opinion, a suicidal measure to the North, whose cities must necessarily become deserted by the diversion of its commercial business to other points. He hoped gentlemen would pause before they adopted so dangerous a scheme.

After which, Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question.

And, after some conversation on a point of order, the question was taken, and there was a second.

And the main question (being on the motion of Mr. FILLMORE to strike out the section) was ordered to be now taken.

A motion to adjourn was made, and rejected.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 72, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Biddle, Bond, A. V Brown, S. H. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Clark, Colquitt, Conner, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Davies, Dawson, Dellet, Fillmore, Fine, Fornance, Galbraith, Rice Garland, Goggin, Goode, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Hand, John Hill of Virginia, John Hill of North Carolina, Hoffman, Holmes, Hunt, Charles Johnston, Leadbetter, Leet, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, Marchand, Monroe, Morgan, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Reed, Rhett, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Albert Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Sweney, Taliaferro, W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, and Wise—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Calhoun, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Coles, James Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Cushing, Dana, John Davis, Dennis, Doan, Duncan, Earll, Eastman, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Floyd, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Graves, Hammond, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hook, Hubbard, James, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leonard, McCarty, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Medill, Mitchell, Montgomery, Naylor, Newhard, Ogle, Parrish, Parmenter, Partis, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Rariden, Robinson, Shaw, Simonton, Slade, Steenrod, Swearingen, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—85.

So the motion to strike out the section was rejected.

The question then recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MONROE asked leave at this time to make a brief personal explanation.

And no objection having made—

Mr. M. said that he had received a letter this morning from the collector of the port of New York, in which that officer stated that he had been misrepresented by him, (Mr. M.) He simply wished to read to the House the contradiction which seemed to have occurred, that he might put himself and the collector right before the country. In the first place the letter said:

"I notice a letter under date of 8th instant, from Washington, published in the Journal of Commerce of this morning, in which there is the following paragraph: 'But it was stated to-day by Mr. Adams that neither he nor his committee, nor the manufacturers, had any thing to do with it. The bill was drawn up by Mr. Butler, the district attorney of New York, and Mr. Hoyt, the collector, and came to the Committee on Manufactures through the Secretary of the Treasury.'"

Then came the part that more immediately affected himself:

"There is also in the same paper a letter from the same place, under date of the 9th instant, in which there is a paragraph in these words, said to have been uttered by you: 'The collector had shown him the bill, but he told him that he did not approve of it, and that he did not consider it a Republican measure.'"

The brief explanation of this matter (said Mr. M.) is, that the collector is here made to say to me that which in fact I said to the collector.

And the question again recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an adjournment, but the yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, he withdrew the motion.

The question was then put on ordering the bill to be read a third time, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 122, nays 32.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, H. J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Blackwell, Briggs, A. V. Brown, Burke, Bynum, Calhoun, Carr, Casey, Clark, Coles, Connor, James Cooper, W. R. Cooper, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Davies, John Davis, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Fine, Floyd, Galbraith, Gates, Goode, Graham, Green, J. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hook, Howard, James, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Montanya, Montgomery, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Newhard, Ogle, Parmenter, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Robinson, jr. Ryall, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shaw, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Storrs, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen Sweney, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Boyd, Chapman, Chittenden, Colquitt, Crabb, Curtis, Dawson, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goggin, Graves, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hoffman, Holmes, Hubbard, Hunt, Lewis, Monroe, Morgan, Parrish, Proffit, Edward Rogers, Shepard, Stanly, Sumter, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Warren, and Wise—32.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

It was then read a third time, PASSED, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, May 13, 1840.

A message was received, from the President of the United States, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 29th December, in relation to bonds issued by the Territory of Florida; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEVIER presented the petition Alexander Coleman, praying to be allowed to locate a section of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memoral of a number of citizens of the State of Illinois, praying an appropriation for public land, to be applied to the construction of a railroad from the Atlantic to the Mississippi river, by the way of Boston and Buffalo, New York; which was ordered to lay on the table and be printed.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, upon certain conditions, made a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

On motion 20,000, extra copies of the report were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Thomas Watkins, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, which was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. LUMPKIN said his object in rising was to ask the consideration, at this time, of a resolution which he had the honor to introduce to the consideration of the Senate several weeks ago, proposing to change the hour of the meeting of the Senate from 12 to 11 o'clock, for the remainder of the present session of Congress. At that time the Senate declined acting upon the resolution, and ordered it to be laid upon the table. The days have since continued to increase in length; and the most important business at that time, under the investigation of the several committees of the Senate, is now before the Senate in the form of reports. Therefore we have no legislative duties which can now employ the entire forenoon of these long days. This morning, sir, (said Mr. L.) I was up, and beheld with admiration and delight, the glories of this lovely bright day spreading the rays of light over the beauties of nature, by which we are surrounded. I then paid the necessary attention to my personal comfort, enjoyed my morning repast at breakfast; and then sallied forth in a walk over a considerable portion of this extended city, enjoying my own reflection, and attending to some matters of business, at various points, in the line of my walk. Then, sir, I came to this hall, at the hour of nine o'clock; since which time I have written some half dezen letters, and directed and franked to my constituents several hundred communications, printed by order of the Senate for the information of the people.

Sir, I am a member of four important standing committees of this Senate: I endeavor to discharge my full share of duty on these several committees; I have on my hands a very extensive and heavy correspondence, none of which is neglected; during the sessions of the Senate I am always at my post; and yet, sir, I find it difficult for me to find useful employment, out of this chamber, through these long forenoons. Sir, I have never been in the habit of postponing the commencement of my day's work till noon. No, sir: if the forenoon of all our days had been spent in idleness, but very few of us would now have the honor of a seat in this honorable body.

For myself, sir, I am very sure that I should never have had the honor of a seat in this hall, if the mornings of my life had been spent in idleness and sloth. We may, sir, make plausible excuses for our waste of public time here, apologies which may satisfy ourselves and each other. But, sir, our beholders, the unofficial people, cannot respect or credit our excuses. The people all know that noon is rather late to commence the task of a full day's work. A day's wages demands a day's work; and it requires no argument to sustain a proposition so simple and so plain.

I may be met by the old argument, that the business of the Senate is greatly in advance of the House—that we have already disposed of the greater portion of our business—that it will require weeks for the House to pass upon the business already sent to that body by the Senate. All this is true; yet will not our example have its salutary effect? Let us do all that duty requires at our hands—leave nothing undone, which ought to be done.

Moreover, sir, the Senate has still before it several very important and deeply interesting subjects to the whole country. Therefore, by meeting at an earlier hour of the day, we shall afford more time for gentlemen fully to discuss these important subjects. We are a talking people, sir—a talking Government. Let us afford ample time for every honorable Senator to deliver himself fully and freely from all the burdens of the spirit of speech-making. I hope, sir, the resolution will be agreed to, and that we shall have an opportunity of witnessing the salutary effects of the proposed change.

Mr. DIXON said he had been a member of the Senate too short a period to be able to correctly judge of the proper duties or hours of meeting for the body. But he had noticed that when rules were once established for the transaction of business in a deliberative body, it was best to adhere to them, unless there was good reason for their alteration. He had listened attentively to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. LUMPKIN] who had offered this resolution, and he was convinced, from those remarks, that it would not be good policy to change our present hour of meeting. It was known to every Senator that the business of this body was greatly in advance of that of the House, and therefore there was no plea of a pressure of business to meet at an earlier hour. The honorable Senator says that by the present arrangement he has a good deal of leisure; but if the hour was changed, it would make but little change in this respect, as we would probably adjourn earlier in the afternoon. By the Senator's account, his hours are devoted to useful labor, and the proposed change would only abridge those useful hours. Besides, sir, he informed us that he has had time to take an excursion this delightful summer morning and to enjoy the scenery of this beautiful city and its environs. Of all this enjoyment he would have been deprived, had the hour of meeting been earlier. He has also mentioned that he has sent off two hundred communications to his constituents. Now, sir, would it not be wrong, by changing the hour of meeting, to deprive these constituents of the satisfaction which they undoubtedly derive from these communications of their honorable representative on this floor? For the business of the committee room, for attention to the business of our constituents at the Departments, for answering the communications of our constituents, he considered the leisure hours of the morning as the most appropriate and convenient, and on this account he was opposed to any change in the hour of meeting.

Mr. SEVIER was much astonished at the objections of the Senator from Rhode Island. He had expected that the gentleman, as one of the oldest members of the body, would set them an example of industry and good habits. Like his friend from Georgia, [Mr. LUMPKIN,] he was on two committees, and hard working committees they were, too, and he had not had, for a month, business enough to amuse him. After breakfast he could get his horse and ride a few miles, and then be here some time in perfect idleness, before the business of the day commenced. He was glad that his friend from Georgia had moved in this matter, and he hoped that he would persist in it. At all events, said Mr. S. if we continue to meet here at 12 o'clock, and sit here doing nothing, let those, whose fault it is, take the responsibility. He wanted to go home, and in order to do so, they must despatch promptly the public business. He hoped that his friend from Rhode Island, who came from a hard working county, would join him in voting for this resolution. Let us, said he, meet early, and sit late, and discharge the business confided to us. We shall then be able to go home with a good conscience. Mr. S. called for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered accordingly.

Mr. NORVELL said if he believed that the change in the hour of meeting would accelerate the progress of the public business, he would most cheerfully vote in favor of the motion. But we were already, as was well known, far ahead of the other branch of Congress in our business, and he could see no good to be attained by meeting at an earlier hour, under present circumstances.

Mr. DIXON said he could not submit, for a moment, to the imputation that his opposition to the motion was occasioned by disinclination to labor, or to further the business of the session. Such a motive would comport ill with the habits and disposition of the people which he had the honor in part to represent on this floor. But the Senator from Arkansas was aware that our progress in business was dependent on the action of the House, and it was well known that the business of that body was greatly behind our own. And are we to come here at sunrise, when we have no business before us to attend to? He was aware of the proverbial industry of the honorable Senator from Arkansas, and he was surprised at his complaint that his leisure time hung heavy on his hands, for it is not generally the industrious who make such complaints. Those disposed to be idle, are those whose time generally hangs heaviest. The industrious man always finds something to do. He thought the present arrangement was the best calculated to promote the convenience of members who had out-door business to attend to, and had heard nothing in the observations of gentlemen to change his opinion.

Mr. KING thought that his friend from Rhode Island was mistaken with regard to the propriety of changing the time of meeting. He did not recollect, in the course of a very long service here, that the Congress of the United States had ever sat more than five months without changing the hour of meeting to 11 o'clock. The business of the country would be much better transacted if they took time to discuss each subject calmly and deliberately without being hurried off to get their dinners; and this could be done by meeting one hour earlier in the morning. At the commencement of the session it was necessary to allow the several standing committees leisure enough in the mornings to mature the business for the action of the Senate; but after the committees had made their reports and the business was on their tables, there was no longer any reason for so late an hour of meeting as 12 o'clock. For himself, he found that, with not a great degree of industry, the mornings were long enough for all his ordinary business, not connected with his legislative duties, and in that time he had leisure enough to look over a great many papers connected with legislation. He thought there had been a disposition to protract this session to an unreasonable extent. He knew not why it was that they should not follow the example set them by the House of Representatives, which now met at eleven. Circumstances which every gentleman understood, had prevented that body from doing much business hitherto, but he now understood there was a disposition manifested among its members to set carnestly to work, and proceed with the business entrusted to them. His impression was, that if gentlemen would be disposed to look more at the business of the country, and less to matters beyond these walls, they would get along better with their legislative duties, and be able to bring the session to a close much sooner. He had no disposition to prevent discussions here. He liked to hear them, and wished the people to have light on all the important questions brought up before Congress, of which there were several. There was the bankrupt question, which he had no hesitation in saying would require a considerable discussion. The people wished information on this subject, and he himself had some doubts with regard to it, and therefore wished to hear it fully discussed. He hoped the resolution would be adopted, and that the business of the Senate might be commenced at an earlier hour of the day.

The question was then taken on the adoption of Mr. LUMPKIN's motion, and it was carried—ayes 22, noes 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Tallmadge, Webster, and Young—17.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill authorizing the granting of letters testamentary and of administration to aliens in the District of Columbia; and

The bill for the relief of certain companies of Michigan militia;

were severally read a third time, and passed.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States being taken up,

Mr. CRITTENDEN spoke at length in opposition to the substitute proposed by the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL replied to the remarks of Mr. C.; and after some further remarks by Messrs. WEBSTER and WALL,

The Senate went into Executive session,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, May 13, 1840.

Mr. HENRY of Pennsylvania, by general consent, presented a memorial from a large number on the citizens of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, praying for an increase of the tariff so as to give af ample protection to all kinds of goods manufactured in the United States; which was accompanied with the proceedings of a public meeting on that subject held in said county. All of which, on motion, were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BEIRNE presented petitions in relation to Peggy Duncan; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina presented a memorial of the members of the bar of the courts of the District of Columbia, and of other citizens of said District, praying that an innocent defendant, who has been acquitted of a criminal charge, may be reimbursed his taxed costs: referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. FLETCHER presented the petition of Harry Richardson, of the State of Vermont: referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, communicating the information called for by the House on the 6th of April, in relation to the delay and irregularity of the mails between the cities of New York and Boston; which was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the information called for by the House on the 6th of April, in relation to the establishment of a naval station south of the Chesapeake Bay; which was, on motion of Mr. BANKS, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

A number of Senate bills on the Speaker's table were read twice, and appropriately referred.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

The first subject in order was the report of the Select Committee on Public Printing; the resolutions in the report were read.

Mr. EVANS moved to amend by striking out all the resolutions, and inserting another set of resolutions reported by the minority of the committee.

These, also, were read.

Mr. E. inquired whether the chairman of the committee had any exposition to present of the grounds of the report.

Mr. BLACK said it had been his intention to say nothing on the report; the report itself contained the measures proposed by the committee, and the reasons on which they founded them. If the minority of the committee had any thing to submit in opposition, or in preference of any other plan, he was ready to hear, and would then reply. The report of the minority referred to the present Congress only; that of the majority contained no such restriction.

Mr. EVANS addressed the House in explanation of the report of the minority of the committee. The minority did report a plan for the present Congress only, because the directions of the House to the committee (which had been drawn up by Mr. BLACK himself) went no further, and because this House had no authority to prescribe for future Congresses. That must be done by law, and not by a simple resolution of one of the Houses.

Mr. E then went into an exposition of the report. The majority had been in favor of a general reduction of 15 per cent. from the standard fixed in 1819; the minority, of an average reduction of 25 per cent. He compared the prices of materials and of labor in 1819 and at the present time; and also the great difference in the amount of work ordered; and went into a series of calculations to show the profit accruing under the present rates of printing, and inferred the propriety of a larger reduction than that reported by the majority of the committee. He stated that the chief expenditure in printing was occasioned by printing extra numbers of documents proceeding from the Departments, especially those containing a great deal of figure work; and on these documents the profits of the printer were the largest; the chief profit being on paper and press-work, in both of which great reductions had taken place.

He went into the deductions to be made for extra labor at night and on Sundays, and for the inequality of the pressure on the office, but thought these were greatly overrated; the introduction of power presses having obviated the necessity of keeping so many hands under wages while without steady employment. He dwelt on the peculiar advantages enjoyed by the Congressional printers in the promptitude and certainty of payment; the absence of dead stock on their hands. Mr. E. then went into the mystery of printer's "fat," which he explained and endeavored to make comprehensible to the House, and insisted that this "fat" more than made up for all disadvantage from illegible copy, night work, &c.

Mr. E. next referred to the opinions of witnesses as to the proper rate of deduction to be made from the prices paid to the Printer of Congress, quoting from the printed testimony submitted with the report, and arguing to show that an average of twenty-five per cent might be deducted, and yet leave a large profit to the printers; but he proposed to distribute the deduction in different proprortions on different classes of the work done; the reasons for which he explained at great length.

He stated the offer of Messrs. Gideon, Stambaugh, and others, to execute the work at this general rate of deduction, and went into extensive calculations to show the existing profits of Blair and Rives, in confirmation of the general views he had submitted, exclusive of the printing for the Senate and the binding of documents, &c.

He concluded by insisting that by the establishment of a Government printing-office the work might be better done, and for half the money now paid.

Mr. BLACK adverted to the incapacity of men not professionally acquainted with printing to form a correct judgment of the details of the present subject. He referred to portions of the testimony taken before the committee, given by parties who had heretofore executed the Congressional printing, and on whose testimony the majority of the committee mainly relied; and argued to show that, taking this testimony as true, it would be unreasonable and injurious to reduce the present prices more than fifteen per cent. He dwelt upon the great and peculiar hazards attending the investment of large capital; on the chance of executing, for any period of time, the public printing of Congress; the immense loss from dead capital lying absolutely useless on the hands of the proprietors, sometimes for years together; the irregularity of the employment; on the necessity which compelled the Printer to keep a large and extra number of workmen, who were employed also in extra hours, and of course at extra compensation, which went greatly to add to the expenses incurred.

Mr. B. admitted the reduction in the price of paper, but doubted whether there was any strength in the argument which had been urged, that additional cheapness was attained by the use of the newly invented steam cylinder press. There was, indeed, additional facility in printing; but he considered that, if not more than counterbalanced, it was at least dearly paid for, by the original cost of the press—which was about $3,000—the wages of the engineer, the outlay for oil, fuel, and water, the wear and tear of the type, the destruction of paper, &c. If gentlemen would take all these matters into consideration, he believed it would be found, when they run the parallel between the expense of printing by the old hand press and that of the steam press, that there was no material difference, if any, in favor of the latter. He blamed no man's notions of economy; he only submitted his own, and he was willing to submit them to his constituents. He believed, if the officers of the Government were better paid, there would be fewer delinquencies and more efficient service. He would not stand by and see any man cheat the Government, but he and his constituents felt a deeper interest in the efficient discharge of the duties of the office, (whatever it might be,) than he did in regard to the dollars and cents; and he believed that, if more attention were paid to the former consideration, and less to the latter, it would be for the benefit of the country.

Mr. B. replied to the argument that the public printing had increased greatly within a few years. He admitted the fact; but who was to blame? The printer or ex-printer? Surely not. This was an extravagance which was to be charged to the body itself; and could not be held as an argument why the printer should not be paid a proper amount for his labor. Was the printer to be reduced and cut down to a starving salary because the House itself chose to expend more money than ought to be expended on public printing? Nothing could be more unreasonable—nothing more unjust Congress itself was answerable. Would they reform it? Order no more documents and frivolous reports, &c. to be printed. The remedy was to cease to make those wild, extravagant orders to print documents which were used only for wrapping paper.

In conclusion, Mr. B. alluded to the report of the majority, which recommended a deduction of fifteen per cent. He candidly confessed, however, that he did not think that that would leave the printer a fair and sufficient compensation, nor such as he ought to receive even in comparison with other avocations in life involving outlay of capital, and a hazard greater than that attending any other business in the country. He did not believe that the printer could get along with that reduction; but the House could decree it if they thought proper. For his own part, he should vote against the resolution. He thought that the very lowest reduction should be ten per cent. and even under that he thought the printer would make but poorly out.

Mr. R. GARLAND wished, he said, to state some facts, but as there were only some thirty members present, he would move that the House take a recess. [It was now a quarter past 3 o'clock.]

Mr. R. GARLAND said, well, then, the House would not take a recess, he would move an adjournment; on which motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 15, nays 52.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. RAMSEY moved a call of the House; which motion was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS addressed a remark to the CHAIR, which was understood to be that he was willing to stay here as long as any one; but as the House could not do business without a quorum, and as they would not adjourn, he supposed they had nothing to do but sit there and amuse themselves in the best way they could.

Mr. CUSHING said that it was not just that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] should address seventy members on a business question, which required the presence and intelligence of all. He would therefore move that the House adjourn

On which motion the yeas and nays were asked and ordered; and being taken, were—yeas 32, nays 63.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved a call of the House; which was rejected.

Mr. CURTIS moved that the House adjourn.

On which motion the yeas and nays were asked and ordered.

Mr. CURTIS thereupon withdrew the motion.

Mr. ADAMS renewed it, remarking that the House might as well be listening to the call of the yeas and nays as doing nothing.

And the yeas and nays were asked and ordered.

Mr. RICE GARLAND desired to state that though he should be glad to state a few facts, and to say something in reply to arguments that had been urged on the other side, still he was willing that the question should be taken, if the House was so disposed.

After a brief conversation, the question was taken, and the vote stood—yeas 37, nays 71.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HENRY moved a call of the House, and asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and being taken, were—yeas 70, nays 50.

So the call was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, but had made only a little progress therein, when, on motion of Mr. DAWSON, all further proceedings on the call were suspended.

Mr. RICE GARLAND then offered to amend the amendment by a resolution setting forth that as it appeared that offers had been made to execute the public printing—one at 25 per cent. less than the prices fixed by the joint resolution of March 3, 1819—and the other at 20 per cent. less than said prices—this House did not deem it expedient to pay the printer there of a higher compensation than that for which other persons who were competent to do the work were willing to perform it.

Mr. EVANS accepted this resolution as a modification, by way of preamble, to his amendment.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked if it was in order to assume facts by way of recital?

Mr. RICE GARLAND said he was assuming nothing. The testimony which had been taken before the committee would fully substantiate that such offers had been made. Mr. G. then referred to the evidence of particular individuals, and to their qualifications to testify; in doing which, he replied to numerous statements made by Mr. BLACK in relation thereto, and contended that the whole report of the majority was based upon a single erroneous calculation, or statement, given in testimony—unintentionally erroneous, no doubt, but still erroneous. Mr. G. entered into a minute examination and comparison of prices, with a view to show the accuracy of the conclusions in the report of the minority, and invited the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLACK] to show that a single error had occurred in the figures upon which that report was based. He dwelt on the amount of capital admitted to be invested—on the expenses incurred of all kinds—on the nett profits admitted to be received—contending that, even after the reduction proposed by the minority should have been made, a sufficient, an abundant remuneration would be left to the printer—a nett profit greater than that realized on any other fair and honest investment of capital; and this, too, after all the risk and hazard to which allusion had been made had been taken into consideration, and which, he said, were scarcely heard of with reference to any other than Congressional printing.

Mr. G. referred to the proceedings in the committee, (as they appeared on the journal which had been printed, and which led to some explanations between Messrs. GARLAND, EVANS, and BLACK,) with a view to show that no original proposition or plan for the reduction of the prices of the public printing had been submitted by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. BLACK,] in the first instance, but that he had been drawn into a sanction of the proposition for a reduction of fifteen per cent. as the lowest of the two propositions made for that object, by the fact that members of the committee on both sides were found to be in favor of reduction to a greater or less extent.

He would not follow the gentleman from Georgia through the motives which he had imputed, rather indirectly to be sure, to a certain portion of the House in regard to the increase of public printing. The House might be responsible for the amount of printing which it thought proper to order; and he (Mr. G.) and those who acted with him, did not say that the printer was to be made responsible, or to be cut down to a starving salary for that. But they did say that the printer would be well and liberally compensated by a much less amount of profit. The compensation, after all the matters to which the gentleman from Georgia had referred, as adding to the expenses and risks of a printing establishment, including the high rates of insurance and every thing else, was most extravagant, and such as ought no longer to be tolerated.

Mr. GARLAND having concluded—

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out all after the word "Resolved," in the amendment to the original resolution, and insert the following: "That the printing for this House shall hereafter be paid for at a rate of ten per cent. less than the prices fixed by the joint resolution of March, 1819.

"Resolved, That the printing executed for this House since the election of printer, shall be paid for as heretofore provided for, and agreeably to all the reservations and provisions contained in the joint resolution of the 3d of March, 1819."

Mr. P. said he would make no remarks beyond this; that he thought the majority and the minority of the committee were both wrong in their conclusions. Upon a critical examination of the testimony of Messrs. Gales and Seaton, and others, who have the best practical knowledge of the business, it would be found that the printers could not stand the reduction proposed. He believed his proposition was about a fair medium between the extremes, and the most just one; and he, therefore, moved the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania moved a call of the House; which was ordered—ayes 60, nays 56.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said it was near 7 o'clock, and if the call was proceeded in they would be kept here a long time before it could be completed, and he therefore moved an adjournment.

Mr. ATHERTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 63, nays 83.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. GALBRAITH said it was now obvious that there was a quorum present, and he moved to dispense with all further proceedings in the call.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; and which having been ordered,

Mr. GALBRAITH withdrew his motion.

The call was then proceeded in till 173 members answered to their names; when

Mr. BANKS moved that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays which were not ordered.

Then, before completing the call,

The House adjourned.

Mr. HENDERSON spoke at length in opposition to the substitute proposed by the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALL replied to the remarks of Mr. H.; and after some further remarks by Messrs. CRITTENDEN, GRUNDY, WEBSTER, NORVELL, and TAPPAN,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 14, 1840.

When the House adjourned on yesterday, the subject before the House was the report of the Select Committee on Printing. The question pending, was the amendment of Mr. PETRIKIN to strike out all after the word "Resolved" in the amendment offered by the minority of the committee, and to insert the following:

"That the printing for this House shall hereafter be paid for at a rate of ten per cent. less than the prices fixed by the joint resolution of March, 1819.

"Resolved, That the printing executed for this House since the election of printer, shall be paid for as heretofore provided for, and agreeably to all the reservations and provisions contained in the joint resolution of the 3d of March, 1819."

The House having adjourned on yesterday in the midst of an unfinished call,

Mr. BRIGGS now moved that all further proceedings on that call be suspended.

Mr. GRAVES hoped not. He desired to have a full House when the question was taken.

The SPEAKER stated that, if the call was proceeded in, it would extend only to those members who were absent at the call of the roll last evening.

On motion of Mr. GRAVES, all further proceedings on that call were suspended; and Mr. MORGAN moved a (new) call of the House.

Mr. GRAVES asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The SPEAKER then stated that the first business before the House was the question of privilege, being the report of the Select Committee raised to investigate the facts in the case of Messrs. R. GARLAND and BYNUM.

So Mr. MORGAN suspended his motion for a call of the House, and Mr. GRAVES withdrew his motion for the yeas and nays.

In reply to an inquiry from Mr. BLACK, the SPEAKER stated that the report of the Select Committee on Printing would be the business next in order, after the case of privilege should have been disposed of.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

The business now before the House being the "report of the Select Committee appointed to investigate the facts relative to the disorder and personal violence which took place in the House between two of its members, to wit, RICE GARLAND and JESSE A. BYNUM,"

Mr. UNDERWOOD hoped, in case the report was taken up, that either prompt action would be had thereon, or that the matter would be indefinitely postponed. With that view, he would take the liberty of presenting some resolutions he had prepared, for the purpose of submitting a few points for the consideration of the House.

In making the motion for the appointment of a committee to investigate this matter, he had been careful to word it in such a way as not to require the committee to report any proposition for the action of the House. He had good reasons for so doing, which would appear in the sequel. What he now proposed came entirely from himself as an individual member of the House, without being sanctioned by any member of the committee, in any way whatever. When on the committee, he did not think he had, under the resolution of the House, any right to recommend any such proposition for their action, but had intended to offer the resolutions he now presented, when the matter shall be taken up by the House.

At the request of Mr. CORWIN, Mr. U. here yielded the floor for a moment.

Mr. CORWIN then said that, as he was compelled to leave the city on indispensable business, he would ask the House to grant him leave of absence for three weeks from Saturday next.

And the leave was granted.

And, on his motion, Mr. CORWIN was discharged from further service as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CRABB of Alabama asked to be excused from further service on the Committee of Elections. He took this course from a sense of duty no less to himself than to the parties to the several contests pending before that committee. Such were the general state of his health and his imperious duties to his immediate constituents, as to forbid his giving that attention to the important questions before the committee, which he was in the habit of giving all matters coming specially under his consideration, and he felt that, under the circumstances, to omit the request he had now preferred to the House, would be palpable injustice to the parties concerned, to the House, and to himself. He felt that he could not sustain himself under the severe labor which must necessarily be incurred by every member of that committee who shall do his duty, and less than that he was unwilling to do in any capacity in which he may be called to act. He assured the House that, if it were practicable for him further to prosecute his duties on said committee in a proper manner, he should be very far from making this request.

And Mr. C. was excused.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then resumed, and said he would make a few comments on the resolutions he intended to offer, but which he desired might be first read by the CLERK. The resolutions were then read, as follow:

Resolved, That experience has shown the necessity of defining with clearness what shall constitute disorderly conduct, and a contempt of this House, and of prescribing the punishment for the offence before the deed is done.

Resolved, That it is incompatible with the spirit of the Constitution, if not in conflict with its letter, to punish a citizen or a member of Congress for disorderly conduct, for a contempt, or a breach of privilege, until the nature of the offence, the facts necessary to constitute it, and the punishment to be inflicted, have been clearly defined and promulgated.

Resolved, therefore, That the following shall henceforth constitute a part of the standing rules of this House, viz:

1. If any person or persons within the Capitol, or any of the enclosed grounds around it, or within any street passing by or around such enclosed grounds, shall hereafter make a noise, or do any other act disturbing or interrupting the deliberations or business of the House of Representatives, or any of its committees, the person or persons so offending, being thereof convicted, by a vote or resolution of the House, shall, for such contempt, be severely reprimanded, or imprisoned not less than one nor more than ten days, at the discretion of the House of Representatives.

2. If any person or persons shall hereafter assault or strike any member of the House of Representatives, or any other person within the Capitol, or any of the enclosures around the grounds of the Capitol, except it be in self-defence, or some lawful purpose, the person or persons so offending shall be adjudged guilty of a contempt to the House of Representatives; and being thereof convicted, by a vote or resolution of the House, shall be imprisoned therefor for a space of time not less than sixty nor more than one hundred and eighty days, at the discretion of the House of Representatives.

3. The person or persons offending within the purview of the two preceding rules, or either of them, shall be arrested by the Sergeant-at-arms, upon the warrant of the Speaker, to be issued upon the oath or affirmation of the party applying therefor.

4. Any member of the House who shall, by contumelious words or actions, insult any other member of Congress within the Capitol, or any of the enclosures around it, including the enclosure to the east of the Capitol, shall, on conviction thereof, by a vote or resolution of the House, be severely reprimanded for the first offence, and expelled for the second.

5. Any member of the House who shall assault or strike any other member of Congress within the Capitol, or within any of the enclosures around it, including the enclosure to the east of the Capitol, unless in self defence, or some lawful purpose, shall, on conviction thereof, by a vote or resolution of the House, be expelled.

6. It shall require a majority of four-fifths to suspend the rules in order to permit a member to notice and repel any statements which may be found in print or manuscript, reflecting upon the moral, political, or official character of any one.

7. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the following shall constitute an additional joint rule of the two Houses: In cases of personal insult or conflict between a Senator and Representative, a committee of two from the Senate and three from the House shall be appointed to investigate the facts, and report to their respective Houses the facts of the case; whereupon that House of which the party in default is a member, shall proceed to punish him according to the rules of either body which he may have violated.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON rose to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. UNDERWOOD) whether it was his intention that these resolutions should first be considered and acted on, before the House had considered the report made by the committee?

Mr. PETRIKIN (pending Mr. UNDERWOOD's reply to Mr. JOHNSON) rose to a question of order. He submitted to the Chair that these resolutions were separate and distinct from the report of the committee, and that they could not be entertained, save by a suspension of the rule.

The SPEAKER was of opinion, he said, that these resolutions were germane to the subject. The committee had reported the facts, these facts were before the House, and it was in order for gentlemen to move any resolutions appertaining thereto.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he would show the relevancy of these resolutions to the report of the committee, and hoped also to be able to show that they ought to be adopted.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON then requested the gentleman from Kentucky to answer his interrogatory, whether it was his (Mr. U's) intention that these resolutions should be considered and acted upon before the House had considered the report of the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said, yes—he wished these resolutions to be acted upon first, and he wished them to be the only action of the House on the subject. It was his desire to show briefly the reasons which induced him to offer them.

Mr. U. after explaining the purport of the 1st and 2d resolutions, proceeded to say that it was needless to call the attention of members to the provisions of the Constitution which laid down the principles he had enumerated. All here were fully aware of them. He would then ask whether this House had ever undertaken to prescribe what should constitute contempt or disorderly conduct. Look at the rules: from the foundation of the Government down to this time, there was not a sentence on this subject. Upon what, then, did the whole system depend? It depended upon legislative usage, without the positive action of any legislative body; and we had to collect authorities on the subject in the history of the British Parliament, in the history of this body, and in the history of the various legislative assemblies of this country.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON rose to a point of order. In his opinion, it was impossible to punish the gentlemen, who were not, by the laws of the House or of the country, subject to punishment before these resolutions were introduced. He thought the resolutions were not relevant to the matter.

The SPEAKER said there could be no doubt that these resolutions were in order, inasmuch as they were germane to the subject-matter of the report. That report related to a case of breach of privilege. On examination, the gentleman from Kentucky had been of opinion that there was no remedy for that particular case, but that it furnished a strong inducement to pass laws or resolutions to govern the conduct of the House, and by which such occurrences might, in future, be prevented.

Mr. PETRIKIN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON had one word to say. These resolutions, he understood, were not the result of the deliberations of the committee; they were not reported officially as the results of that deliberation; but they came from an individual member of the committee. They were not the official acts of the organ of the House, but of one individual member of it.

The SPEAKER said that cases had frequently occurred in which the committee reported merely facts, and in which some member moved a resolution connected with the subject-matter of that report. For instance, in the contested election between Prentiss and Word and Claiborne and Gholson, the committee reported only the facts; a gentleman then rose, and moved that one party or the other were not entitled to their seats. That was a resolution growing out of the facts of the case.

Mr. PETRIKIN regretted his ideas of order differed from those of the CHAIR, and it was with great reluctance that he had taken the appeal. But if these resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky were permitted to pass, it would be establishing a bad precedent. Here a report was made from a committe, giving the facts of a certain transaction, and, under pretence of acting under that report, a gentleman wished to introduce resolutions of the most dangerous tendency, calculated, among other things, to destroy the right of trial by jury. He contended that the resolutions had no relevancy or connexion, either directly or indirectly, with the report of the committee. They had no bearing whatever upon the report, and consequently the House could have no action upon them. For instance, one portion of the resolution referred to disturbances on the highway; and was that relevant to the subject of the report? Certainly not. He was therefore compelled, as a matter of duty, to make the appeal.

Mr. TILLINGHAST contended that the resolutions were perfectly in order; and inasmuch as the committee had recommended no action, it was proper for any member to propose that which the committee were not instructed to do.

Mr. BRIGGS considered the resolutions as having no relation to the report of the committee. In case they should be adopted, the report would remain undisposed of untouched.

Mr. BANKS thought that the SPEAKER and the House would bear witness that he had never risen to a question of order since he had first taken his seat on the floor, and it was with extreme regret that he ever said any thing in relation to such questions, as it was always with painful emotions that he ever disagreed with the opinion of the presiding officer.

In the present case it was his deliberate judgment that the CHAIR was wrong in deciding this resolution, offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, to be in order. He, Mr. B. considered them as totally irrelevant to the question before the House, inasmuch as they referred only to such cases as might hereafter occur, and did not touch the present unpleasant and disagreeable affair. Besides, the resolution interfered and infringed on the standing rules of the House. He perfectly agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] that whatever disposition we might make of these resolutions, the report of the committee will remain untouched

As to the case of Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, to which the gentleman from Kentucky had referred, that did not bear him out in the position he had taken; for the resolutions offered on that occasion were based on the evidence accompanying the report, and were, therefore, perfectly relevant. But, were these resolutions based upon the evidence or the facts of the report? No: they have nothing to do with the report of the committee. If the gentleman had proposed any action upon the report—if he had proposed to censure or to expel the parties, then it would have been in order. But the resolutions did not propose to touch the matter, and referred solely to cases which might occur hereafter, and besides that, the resolution went to abrogate some of the standing resolutions of the House. He did not deny the power of the House to legislate so as to provide for the future, but he considered that the present case should be disposed of first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was surprised at the course of gentlemen in opposing the resolutions. The committee had, in accordance with instructions, reported all the facts, and now gentlemen contended that the House must confine itself strictly to this case, and had no power to legislate for the future.

Mr. BANKS: I said no such thing. The gentleman is mistaken. I admitted that we had the right to legislate prospectively.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then went on to contend that instead of his resolutions abrogating any standing rule of the House, there was no rule which applied to the case. He proposed to make a new law, which should cover such cases. According to his view of the Constitution, there could be no law to define this particular offence; and the only way in which it could be reached, was by a reference to the practice of the British Parliament, and of this body in former years. He denied there was any other way by which this particular offence could be reached. What he wished to do, was to establish a system of law, so as to apply to all such cases. But how was the appeal sustained by the gentlemen from Virginia and Pennsylvania? Why, on the ground that the resolutions interfered and infringed on the standing rule of the House. Now the fact was, the resolutions interfered with no standing rule.

Mr. BANKS referred him to the standing rule which provides that two-thirds shall be required for the expulsion of a member, whereas one of the resolutions proposed four-fifths. Was not that an interference on one of the standing rules?

Mr. UNDERWOOD admitted that in this instance his resolutions were not in order, and he was willing to withdraw that portion.

The SPEAKER modified his decision so far as to except that portion of the resolutions, which proposed a change of the rule; the rule, as at present existing, requiring one day's notice of amendment.

Mr. BANKS said as the gentleman had now changed the issue, and intended to propose some action on the report, he would no longer support the appeal.

Mr. VADERPOEL demanded the the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. BOYD moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 83, nays 96.

So the motion to lay the whole subject on the table was rejected.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question on the appeal, there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered.

On the requisition of the CHAIR, Mr. W. C. JOHNSON reduced his point of order to writing; which was substantially as given above—adding thereto that the resolution proposed a change of the rules—a proposition which could not be made without one day's notice.

And the main question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" was then then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 108.

So the decision of the Chair was reversed, and the resolutions declared to be out of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that, as some gentlemen had suggested that most of the resolutions which he had offered were in order, provided they were connected with the transaction between Messrs. R. GARLAND and BYNUM, he would propose to offer the following resolution as the first of the series, and then to strike out two of the others—the one proposing a change of the rule so as to require a majority of four fifths, and the other proposing joint action on the part of the two Houses. The following resolution was then read:

Resolved, That this House ought not to take any further notice of the occurrence between Mr. RICE GARLAND and Mr. JESSE A. BYNUM, but should legislate to prevent the occurrence of such cases in future.

[Here follow the other resolutions, excepting the two numbered six and seven.]

Mr. CUSHING submitted to the Chair that these resolutions were out of order.

The SPEAKER, refering to the decision just made, said in his opinion they were so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD appealed from this decision.

Mr. PETRIKIN submitted to the Chair that an appeal could not be taken, because the question had already been decided.

Mr. UNDERWOOD claimed the floor.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was entitled to the floor. The SPEAKER was of opinion that the proposition now offered was substantially that on which a decision had just been made; but it would be placing an arbitrary power in the hands of the SPEAKER to say that a gentleman should not appeal from his decision.

The appeal was spoken to by Mr. UNDERWOOD, in opposition to the decision of the Chair, and by Mr. CUSHING in support of it.

After which, Mr. TAYLOR moved the previous question; on which motion there appeared—ayes 81, noes not counted.

So there was a second. And the main question was ordered to be taken.

Mr. EVERETT inquired of the Chair whether the question could not be decided so as to take the question on the first branch of the resolutions?

The SPEAKER said no, not on an appeal.

And the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" was was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

So the decision of the Chair was affirmed.

Mr. WISE said he had not risen for the purpose of submitting any proposition; but he had a remark to make, to which he asked the especial attention of honorable members. I make it (continued Mr. W.) because I consider I have more right to make it than any other member of this House. It is this: that now, after all the parade you have made upon this case of disorder, if you do not take action upon it, and exercise the power you possess, you will do strong and violent injustice to both members of the House who are implicated in a charge of disorderly behavior. Placed in the position in which they are placed now—a position similar to that which I have myself been placed in heretofore, in a much more serious case, and when charges of a much more serious character were made against me, at the last Congress—sir, I can appreciate the injustice you will do these members; and I can sympathize with them, if now, after the appointment of a committee, you should decide that the whole matter shall be laid upon the table. I voted this morning against the motion to lay the whole subject on the table, not that I especially desired any action upon it, for I shall not sit upon the case; but because, as I have already said, if you do not take action, you will do these gentlemen injustice; you will do to one or both of them injustice similar to that violently done to me on a former occasion. I refer to the case of pretended privilege dragged before this House at its last long session; and I refer to it only as an argument illustrative of the injustice that may be done now. I do not wish again to call it up for discussion here. But after arraigning gentlemen for disorder or breach of privilege, without deciding who was right or who was wrong; nay, without even allowing an opportunity to discuss the question as to who was right or who was wrong; after goading gentlemen, members of this House; after stigmatizing them with breaches of privilege, and even with the commission of murder, you bury the whole affair, not in oblivion, but in the confusion or a report. After arraigning men before the country and the world for a breach of privilege, after charging them with every high crime and misdemeanor disgraceful to human nature, the House was not even willing to take up and examine into the merits of the case, and to decide upon it. In my own case, not even down to this very hour, have I been able to get the publication of the testimony to meet the charges which have been scattered through the world against me. Are you about to do the same injustice now to these members? Day after day, in the case to which I have alluded, were gentlemen waiting anxiously for a trial—day after day were they watching, with deep solicitude, for the moment when they might appear at the bar of the House, and speak for themselves, while the press, and the public, and the world, were all speaking against them.

The SPEAKER here intimated to Mr. W. that it was not in order to discuss the merits of that case.

Mr. WISE resumed. I am not about to do so. I have merely referred to it by way of illustration, and for the purpose of asking whether such is to be the course of proceeding in the present case.

I have one other remark to make. The precise course which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has proposed now, was proposed then. Instead of taking up the parties and punishing them, if they were guilty—instead of expelling them from this House—instead even of sending them into the State of Maryland, if you had the power, that they might stand their trial before a jury of the country upon charges which would, if they were guilty, have sent them to the gallows, or which at least ought to have hung them if guilty, you proposed to drop the case, and to adopt ulterior, prospective legislation; and thus you stigmatized the men engaged in that transaction, without deciding upon its merits. What has been the consequence? On this point I have one word to say, and, indeed, it was my chief object in rising. After the ulterior legislation that was adopted—legislation tying every man to the stake to be shot at by every body who chose to insult him in and out of his place—I call upon my fellow-members here to bear me witness that I have, as my conduct will attest, scrupulously forborne to use offensive or personal language here. I would now, since the passage of the anti-duelling law, sooner strike a woman than I would insult a member of the House. I would do any act of meanness or of baseness rather than I would insult a man whose hands are tied. I have forborne and I intend to forbear. But I ask you, sir, I ask the members of this House, I ask the moral portion of our community, as some denominate themselves, in case I am insulted, before I fly to the sanctuary and prepare with angelic spirit to turn one cheek when the other is smitten, what am I to do? Am I to have a battle with cut-glass inkstands, or at fisticuffs, or a pulling of noses, or a scene of harsh and strong epithets? As you have tied my hands, what ought you to do for me, and for each and every member of the House? You would do exactly what I know you would do in this case; you will take it up, you will have the parade of getting up a committee to report the facts, and, after they are reported for you to act on, you will lay the whole matter on the table! In conclusion, I say—and with a hope, God knows how sincerely uttered, that I may never be called upon again to interfere in such matters—either repeal your anti-duelling law, or enforce your laws of order with rigidity. Beyond this I have nothing to say.

Mr. POPE rose (he said) to make a motion which he hoped would meet the approbation of the House. He had paid some attention to this proceeding, and was of opinion that the occurrence to which the report of the committee referred had done rather good than harm in this body. Such an occurrence was the necessary result of the course of proceeding here during the present session. He spoke without distinction as to parties. The SPEAKER had not been able to preserve order, owing to that course of proceeding. When a Whig got up and was lashing away at a gentleman on the other side, the cry would be "go on" whenever an attempt was made to arrest him. So on the other side. When a member of the Administration party was speaking harshly of a Whig, any attempt to arrest him was voted down; and thus gentlemen were permitted to proceed pretty much in what way they pleased. This state of things could not end any otherwise than as it did. One gentleman [Mr. R. GARLAND] had made a direct apology to the House, and he hoped that such would be the case with the other gentleman, and that thus the harmony of the House might be restored without resort to further proceedings. Under these circumstances, the suggestion of his friend and colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that no further action should be taken, met his (Mr. P's) approbation. The committee had been unanimous in their report of the facts, and the conduct of both parties was fully and fairly before the country. Without giving any opinion either on the one side or the other, he thought it would be better to let the subject drop, and to leave to public opinion to censure or not. The House had behaved much better since the occurrence took place, and he hoped that they would show, by their future conduct, that they regretted the course of proceeding which, as all must admit, had been tolerated too long.

After a few remarks as to the condition of the public business and the necessity for action, Mr. P. concluded by moving to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 86, nays 93.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. JENIFER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That should any member on this floor so far forget the respect he owes to his own character and duty to the House, as to use offensive language to any of his fellow-members, upon being called to order and decided to be out of order, such offending member shall be immediately called on to make a full and ample apology to the House and to the member so offended, and upon refusal be expelled from his seat in this House.

The SPEAKER decided this resolution to be out of order.

Mr. HOLMES said: Mr. Speaker, I agree most fully with the view taken by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] that justice demands that prompt and decisive action should be taken. Yes, sir, justice to the gentlemen concerned, but emphatically justice to this House, and to the people of this nation, whose Representatives we are. I move the resolution I hold in my hand, under the most painful emotions which I have ever experienced in any parliamentary body. But, sir, justice demands that this course should be taken, and when justice demands, sympathy must give way. Sir, I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the conduct of RICE GARLAND and JESSE A. BYNUM, in fighting upon the floor of the House of Representatives during the session of Congress, was a gross violation of the dignity of the House, and calls upon the House to vindicate its dignity by an expulsion of the said RICE GARLAND and JESSE A. BYNUM.

Mr. CHINN asked for the yeas and nays: ordered.

Mr. CRAIG was not prepared, under all the circumstances of the case, to vote for this resolution. It savored rather of an ex post facto proceeding. He proposed, therefore, to amend it by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting:

"That the report be recommitted to the same committee, with instructions to report what action should be had in the case; and also what measures should be adopted to prevent like occurrences in future, and to protect the members of the House from insult and violence."

Mr. PROFFIT moved the previous question, but withdrew the motion.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting the following:

"That JESSE A. BYNUM and RICE GARLAND are guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House."

Mr. BRIGGS said that the committee, in accordance with their instructions, had reported the facts of the case, and it was now for the House to say what proceeding they would take. If both gentlemen had committed a breach of privilege, the House ought to say so; and when that fact should be established, the next question was, what punishment, if any, should be inflicted. When the House came to decide upon this question, it would become them to look into the character and details of the transaction; and to see whether, if both were guilty, they were guilty alike. If not, if one was a greater offender than the other, justice and propriety required that the punishment should be different, because the same punishment should only follow the same offence. He was prepared, in view of the facts, to go at least as far as this resolution went, and to say that both members had violated the privilege of the House. And he was willing to say so by his vote.

Mr. M. A. COOPER asked Mr. HOLMES to accept the following as a modification of his resolution:

Resolved, That the whole subject be recommitted to the same committee, with instructions to report what further proceedings are necessary on the part of the House, and also the form in which said proceedings shall be had.

Mr. HOLMES declined to do so.

Mr. JENIFER expressed himself opposed to any proposition that would not bring the House to a decisive vote. He was glad that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HOLMES] had offered his proposition; and although he (Mr. J.) intended no censure on the committee, yet he thought that such a proposition should have come from them long since. If this proceeding went unrebuked, how would the House ever hereafter punish any man for a violation of its privileges? He would vote in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina; he should do so with reluctance, still he would do it. The House owed it to its own character and to the character of the country not only to rebuke this proceeding in the strongest manner, but now to take a stand and prevent the recurrence of such scenes in future. It was with this view that he had offered the proposition which the SPEAKER had declared to be out of order. Mr. J. spoke of the calumnies and abuse which the House, by its own course, had let in upon itself. Something must be done to arrest it. He believed that any other man would have done what the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] had done under the circumstances, but still nothing could justify it here, and he (Mr. J.) would, reluctantly, as he had said, give his vote for expulsion, and that, too, without discrimination.

Mr. PROFFIT was astonished that the gentleman from Maryland should be capable of thinking for a moment that they ought to expel the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] in the face of the evidence reported to the House. Neither could he vote for the expulsion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] because, previous to the unfortunate occurrence, the House had permitted disorderly speeches to be made, which must ever necessarily terminate in such disgraceful scenes. He did not pretend to be very orderly himself. He hoped, however, that the House would not vote for the expulsion of the parties, but in future enforce its rules of order, so that a recurrence of such events might be prevented. He considered the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HOLMES] as at least an imprudent act.

Mr. BRIGGS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 73, nays 106.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the indefinite postponement of the whole subject, because he was satisfied that if the House should determine to go into a proper investigation of the matter, it would consume several weeks, and result in no healthy action. It would then be laid on the table, or be indefinitely postponed. He contended that they should be doing the business of the country instead of wasting the time in the manner they had been doing. The seamen in the employ of the United States, were now suffering for their pay. There was no money to fit out the vessels necessary to protect our commerce on the coast of China. Every interest was being sacrificed by the course of legislation here, by wasting the time of the people in idle discussions. It was too late now for these gentlemen to be talking about their dignity, and the dignity of the House; why did they not begin several years ago. This was not the first time that the dignity of the House had been offended against by those very men who now talk so loud about it, and who pretend to be so anxious to defend it. He saw no good reason why these gentlemen should be made a mark to be shot at, when there were many others, who had been twenty times as guilty as they, who were permitted to escape—who had violated the rules, time after time, by using offensive language, and by refusing to vote, and thereby setting at defiance the rules of the House. Others may wish to postpone the business of the country, to amuse themselves, by trying those gentlemen for offending against their dignity; but he was opposed to it. He had no doubt that there were many in the House, who make so much noise about the offended dignity of the House, who did more to commit violations of it than those who said nothing about it. He thought those gentlemen had been sufficiently punished for this rash act, which was committed in the heat of passion. There was no one who was prepared to say that the act was done intentionally.

There was nothing premeditated—it was the result of passion. If they had committed a worse act, without intention, we could not, as jurymen, declare them guilty to the same degree as if the act had been premeditated. It was the intention that made the crime. Would to God that this was the only instance of disorder and indecorum that the House had witnessed. But far worse scenes than that had transpired. Men who had been the foremost in violating the rules, by refusing to vote, and other disorder, now come forward, and affectedly claim to be the only conservators of the decorum and rules of the House. Let every member examine his own conscience, and see whether he can, consistently with his own conduct, vote to expel these gentlemen for this indiscretion.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON addressed the House at considerable length, insisting on the importance of some decided course being adopted to prevent the occurrence of such cases of violence in future. Should the House refuse to punish, its members would be abandoned to their own protection, and tempted to inflict the most violent retaliation in case of personal insult. Language that would disgrace the purlieus of Billingsgate and St. Giles had already been uttered over and over on the floor, and if these things were suffered to proceed, the House would fall into confusion and public contempt. It was no excuse to say that the conduct of these gentlemen was the result of a momentary impulse; gentlemen must learn to practise self-restraint, and, if they had injuries to punish, to reserve the settlement of such matters to a more suitable time and place. He was opposed to the postponement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he had voted against all propositions to postpone or to lay on the table, and his object had been to let new members see what course was to be expected here in cases like the present. He adverted to the vain attempts formerly made to punish disorders in the House, and attributed the whole difficulty to the radical error of having no rules of the House to declare what should be esteemed disorderly conduct, and how it should be punished. Mr. U. insisted that this was not a case of breach of privilege, but a case of contempt. The Constitution conferred but two privileges on members of Congress; one was, exemption from arrest; the other was exemption from being called on out of the House to answer for words spoken in debate.

Mr. U. quoted largely from Jefferson's Manual, commenting as he proceeded.

Mr. CUSHING suggested to him another passage in the same book, declaring quarrels in the House to be breaches of privilege.

Mr. U. denied that authority as contrary to the Constitution, and went on to insist that there ought to be prospective legislation by the House, specifying offences and punisments for members of Congress in the House, as laws were provided in the community for other citizens out of doors. Mr. U. having made a full exposition of his views on this point, said he now washed his hands of this case: holding the principles he did, he could not vote to punish the individuals now implicated.

After some brief remarks from Mr. STANLY.

Mr. BANKS moved the previous question.

Mr. BYNUM remonstrated, and said he should like to be heard before a final vote was taken.

Mr. BANKS thereupon withdrew his motion.

Mr. PETRIKIN declared himself now satisfied that his motion for indefinite postponement was not in order.

Mr. McKAY advocated a recommittal of the whole subject to the same Select Committee, to report whether the House could take any, and what, action in this case. The committee would, doubtless, have done this, but the resolution under which they were appointed did not admit of it, as it directed them simply to report the facts as they happened.

On a former occasion, he had voted to lay the whole matter on the table; but as the House had thought proper to refer it to a committee, he thought, after that, some action should be had thereon. But he was perfectly satisfied, not only from what had occurred that day, but from experience in such cases, that no good was to be attained by prolonging a discussion. It was with that view that he had voted against motions to lay on the table, in the hope that the House would become satisfied that no good could result, and consent to a recommittal, with instructions to the committee to recommend some action on the matter. It was possible that the committee might agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that the offence could not be defined. But whatever might be their conclusions, it was due to the dignity and consistency House to make a final disposition of the matter, now they had gone thus far. And if the committee should report that the offence could not be punished, owing to there being no specification of it, even that would exonerate the House, and show to the country that all had been done which the nature of the case admitted. For his part, he had great confidence in the committee, and if they should come to the conclusion that the House had no authority, that would be satisfactory to the country. But by leaving the matter as it now stood, after having gone so far as to print the facts, it would be a disgrace to the House in all time to come, and establish a dangerous precedent for all future cases. He hoped no gentleman would object to the recommittal, as the committee was so happily constituted, that whatever report they might make could not fail to be satisfactory to all.

Mr. RHETT replied to Mr. UNDERWOOD, insisting that, without further legislation, the House was fully empowered to punish disorderly conduct. Some acts were so manifestly disorderly, that no doubt could be pretended in relation to them, of which fighting on the floor during the sittings of the House was certainly one. Mr. R. said there could be no law passed defining what should be deemed disorderly conduct, without the concurrence of the Senate and the President. Did the gentleman wish, then, to act on a question of the privileges of members of that House? He presumed not. He then quoted the clause of the Constitution which makes the House the sole judge in such cases, and empowers it to punish.

Mr. WISE thought all the resolutions which had been offered premature. The House must act judicially in the matter; refer it to no committee, but judge of the evidence for itself; and even this it could not lawfully do till the parties had been taken into custody, and arraigned on articles of accusation, and put upon their defence. There was not the shadow of a doubt as to the power of the House to punish; but it must be after a regular trial.

Mr. UNDERWOOD replied, and spoke in vindication of the ground he had before assumed. He quoted other passages of the Constitution in reply to Mr. RHETT, arguing that though Congress possessed power to punish piracy, that did not prevent the necessity of its first 'defining" what piracy was, and passing laws for its punishment.

The doctrine of contempts was a doctrine of the common law; but in Kentucky it had been found necessary to limit and define it by statute, and there was the same necessity here. He scouted the idea of going into a formal trial, as proposed by Mr. WISE; it would occupy the rest of the session, and after all, would result in nothing.

Mr. CHINN now moved the previous question, which was seconded, put, and carried.

But, on Mr. ADAMS'S remonstrance, who declared he could not vote unless the parties had an opportunity to be heard,

The vote for the previous question was, on motion of Mr. ANDREWS, reconsidered—ayes 69, noes 60.

Mr. BRIGGS then proposed that the parties b now called upon to state their objections, if any they could show, to the adoption of the amendment declaring them guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House.

Messrs. GARLAND and BYNUM declined addressing the House.

Mr. McKAY read an extract from one of the documents of the House, in which was a case in point, where the House had, in a similar case, proceeded thus far, and afterwards re-committed the whole subject to the same committee. In the present case, the committee had been unanimous in their report of the facts; and was there not good reason to expect the same unanimity in any recommendation they might make? And if they agreed that in their opinion the House had no power to punish, that would be perfectly satisfactory, and would go out to the country, as the reason why the House had not acted on the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland was opposed to recommitment. By referring the subject to a committee, it would be transferring the power of House to examine into the facts, to that committee. It was the duty of the members, as the judges who were to try the case, to hear and examine the facts the facts themselves. The persons accused had not been afforded an opportunity to defend themselves on this floor, the only proper place in which they should be heard. The House was the only proper place in which to interrogate witnesses. They were the triers, and should hear all the testimony. If he should ever be so unfortunate as to be involved in a difficulty with a fellow member, he would never consent to be tried in the damp dungeons of the Capitol by any committee, but claim to be heard before the jury which was to decide on his case—the House. Mr. J. went into an argument to show why questions of privilege should be tried in the House alone. He was opposed, on principle, to referring the character and standing of members to a committee; because the committee might be so constructed by a partisan Speaker as not to afford an impartial examination into the facts. It would, in effect, be giving the whole power of the House to try, into the hands of the Speaker, operating through his committee. After showing the necessity of action on the subject, he said if the House declined to give any action, the whole subject had better be laid on the table; but if it felt disposed to check indiscretion and disorder, now was the time to do it.

Mr. TILLINGHAST read the following, which he thought would be proper as a preliminary resolution, to precede the amendment proposed by Mr. BRIGGS:

"Whereas the committee appointed to report the facts of the case of violence that occurred in this House between Messrs. RICE GARLAND and JESSE A. BYNUM; have made their report, and this House is now about to take order thereon:

"Resolved, That Mr. SPEAKER call on the said RICE GARLAND and JESSE A. BYNUM now to show cause, if any they or either of them have, why the House should not now proceed to act and adjudge upon the facts as set forth in said report, and that they now have an opportunity to be heard in respect to the facts so reported, and in respect to the action and judgment of the House thereon."

The CHAIR ruled this resolution not to be in order at present.

Mr. BRIGGS then went into a recapitulation of the successive steps which had thus far been taken; and insisted that the parties had had the fullest opportunity before the committee of adducing their witnesses and cross-examining them, and of making their own statements at large. Since then, they had had an opportunity afforded them in the House; and had declined availing themselves of it. What was now in the way to prevent the House from proceeding to act on the report of the committee? As to what Mr. PETRIKIN had said about former disorders, one evil did not excuse another; and the frequent recurrence of such cases did but the more clearly show the necessity of some decided action on the part of the House to prevent them in future.

Mr. EVERETT made some remarks scarce heard at all by the Reporter, but which were understood to deprecate the parties being judged without a hearing before the House, and such proceedings as might appear on its records as a judicial transaction. He thought the accusation ought to be brought to a point, and presented in an explicit form. And he proposed a resolution going to recommit the subject, with instructions to the committee to report what course ought to be taken, and what should be the mode of proceeding.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment not to be in order, it being, in substance, the same with one already offered by Mr. CRAIG.

Mr. RHETT, in reply to the arguments of Mr. WISE, that the member should be arrested by the Sergeant-at-arms, and arraigned at the bar of the House, denied that it was at all necessary. The object of arrest was to bring before the House such persons as were not in the House, but the member was in the House, and had a right to defend himself, and be heard, if he thought proper to do so, without any formal motion to that effect; and no member had a right to call him to order, if he were to rise to address the House. He defied the gentleman to produce one instance in parliamentary history, where a member was arrested, and arraigned, under the circumstances, as was contended for by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

Mr. WELLER moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. CRAIG, who wished to change the relative order between his own amendment and that offered afterwards by Mr. BRIGGS: he wished Mr. BRIGGS's to go first, and his own to follow. He accordingly withdrew his own amendment, and then offered it as an amendment to the amendment of Mr. BRIGGS.

The question being about to be taken,

Mr. TURNEY moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. BRIGGS; and being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 63, nays 95.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. WELLER renewed his call for the previous question; but said he would withdraw it, if either of the gentlemen wished to address the House. It was seconded, put, and carried.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia offered the following resolution, and expressed a wish that Mr. CRAIG would accept it; which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the whole subject be recommitted to the Select Committee, with instructions to report what further proceedings are necessary on the part of the House; and also the form in which the said proceedings shall be had.

Mr. CRAIG accepted it as a modification; and the question being on its adoption,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 106, nays 57.

So the whole subject was recommitted.

Mr. ANDREWS moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. PARRIS demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 83, nays 79.

The House accordingly adjourned.

IN SENATE,

Mr. WHITE presented the affidavits of sundry individuals of Wiskonsin Territory, on the subject of a claim to lands at Milwaukie: laid on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Steenrod; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported

A bill for the relief of Mary W. Thompson;

A bill authorizing the purchase of an island at the confluence of the St. Peters and Mississippi rivers; and

A bill making appropriations to complete certain military roads in the State of Arkansas; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Henry Wilson; which was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for the relief of David Stone; and

The bill authorizing the harbors of Sippican and Mattapoisett, in the State of Massachusetts, to be known hereafter as ports under those names, were read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Francis Cazeau was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, after some remarks from Messrs STRANGE and CALHOUN, was recommitted the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan having been read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. PORTER objected to the bill, on the ground that there were no white settlers in the new district proposed to be established, and none likely to go there for some time to come. He saw no necessity for another land district in Michigan. A sufficient number were established in that State already. He did not think it probable that any lands would be purchased in the proposed district for some years, nor that any settlements of white people would be made in it for a long time. He had been informed by a member of the Senate of Michigan [the Reporter understood him to say Mr. Bridge] that an additional land office was unnecessary in that country; and he had derived other facts which led him to his conclusions, from Mr. Robert Stewart, now in this city. In the course of his remarks, he also stated that there were no organized counties nor any other counties with any other than imaginary lines, within the proposed new district.

Mr. NORVELL said, that the bill now before the Senate, which had yesterday been ordered to a third reading, proposed to divide the Grand River land district into two districts, and to establish a new one, to be called the Grand Traverse District, in a portion of the north section of Michigan. Since the late surveys were made in the Grand River district, it had been ascertained that it contained about ten millions of acres of land actually surveyed, and nearly or quite ready to be brought into market, besides about one million remaining to be surveyed. The existing district, as proposed to be limited by the bill, contained upwards of five millions of unsold lands, and the new district about the same quantity. Each of these districts was, as he understood, larger than almost any other land district in the United States. The bill had met the approbation of the Committee on Public Lands in the Senate, the committee in the other House, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It contained other provisions besides those to which he had adverted. It annexed, for the present, all the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, with the islands in Lake Huron, and its waters, lying within the limits of the State, to the Detroit land district. And it authorized the President to change the location of certain of the land offices, whenever, in his judgment, the public interests required it. He was really at a loss to understand the motive or the object of his colleague, in the opposition which he had just disclosed to the bill. It was the first time that he had ever heard it alleged as an objection to the establishment of a land district and a land office, that the white settlements in the district were small, or that there were none in it. He had supposed that the object of establishing such districts and offices was to attract settlers—to enable them to make their selections, and enter their lands with convenience, and thus to accelerate the settlement of the country. For himself, he would say that he should never be the man who would resist any measure calculated to facilitate and hasten the settlement, cultivation, and population of his own State. That was a policy which he could never reconcile to his feelings, or to his sense of duty to the State which had conferred upon him the honor which he enjoyed of representing her in the councils of the nation.

But, in point of fact, he had understood from the Representative of Michigan in the other House, who resided in the western section of the State, that a white settlement commenced two years ago, and was going on within the proposed new land district, on the Manistee river. Valuable lands were found in that district. They were destined to an early occupation and settlement. The country would probably fill up rapidly. When the first land office was established in Michigan, the whole peninsula, containing more than twenty-five millions of acres, had not five thousand white inhabitants within its limits. The western section had not been occupied by a single white man. In regard to the counties alluded to, he had never before heard of a county in Michigan bounded by imaginary lines. There was no such thing. Every county was distinctly described, and its boundaries laid down in the law. He had learned that the whole country in question had been laid off into counties at the late session of the Legislature of the State. Counties in that State were at first organized for individual purposes, and annexed to other counties for political purposes. When they attained a particular and designated amount of population, they were fully organized for all purposes. But every county had, from the beginning, not its imaginary, but its specific boundaries. In relation to the number of land districts in Michigan, there were at this time but five, when she had upwards of twenty millions of acres of unsold public lands lying within her limits. Other States had a much greater comparative number of land offices. Illinois had ten, with only about eighteen millions of acres of unsold lands. By a bill which had passed the Senate, one of the land districts in Michigan would be abolished at once, because it contained but a few thousand acres of land remaining to be sold. Another of them, by the progress of sales, would, under the operation of that bill, be abolished in a year or two. He hoped that the bill now before the Senate would pass, without further opposition.

Mr. WALKER submitted his views in favor of the bill. He said that the Committee on the Public Lands had always acted with caution in the creation of new land districts; and they had carefully ascertained the necessity of establishing the one in Michigan, embraced by the bill, before they had determined to report it. Upwards of five millions of acres of land were included in the new district, and a larger quantity in the old district from which the new one was taken. This was a larger district than perhaps any other in the United States. As to settlers in the new district, it was not material whether there were few or many. Four districts had been established in Mississippi, with very few settlers in any of them. They were established before the lands were ready to be brought into market. The bill which passed this body some time ago, abolished nine or ten land districts, and at least one in Michigan. No increase of districts would be made by this bill.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky opposed the bill, and

Mr. CLAY of Alabama supported it.

Mr. KING suggested an amendment, withholding compensation from the Register and Receiver until they entered on the discharge of their duties.

Mr. NORVELL presented such an amendment; which was unanimously agreed to.

The question was then taken, and the bill passed—ayes 22, noes 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Wright, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Lumpkin, Merrick, Porter, Prentiss, Ruggles, Tallmadge, and White—12.

The bills ordered to be engrossed yesterday were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, directors of an association called "The New England Mississippi Land Company," was taken up, and after some remarks by Messrs. STRANGE and CALHOUN, was, on motion of Mr. HUBBARD, recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, was considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and the question was still on Mr. WALL's substitute for the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana argued at large on most of the great and important topics already mentioned as belonging to the subject. He examined and discussed the peculiar principles and provisions of the substitute, opposing it, and repudiating them as wrong and inexpedient, and advocating, with much zeal and earnestness, the original bill from the committee.

Mr. WEBSTER having intimated his desire to address the Senate on this subject—

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, it was postponed to Monday next.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, was taken up, and, after having been amended in several particulars, its further consideration was postponed until Monday next.

On motion, the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, May 15, 1840.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina asked leave to refer a petition, on a subject already before the House, to the appropriate committee.

Mr. REYNOLDS also asked leave to refer a petition to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Objection being made, leave was not granted.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked if it would be in order to devote the morning hour to the reception of petitions.

The SPEAKER replied that it could be done only by the consent of two-thirds.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following communications:

1. Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the information required by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of March last, respecting the progress which has been made in effecting a treaty with the Wyandott Indians for the purchase of their lands in Crawford county, Ohio.

On motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

2. Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th ultimo, a system of national defence and the establishment of a National Foundry.

On motion of Mr. WISE, so much as relates to a national foundry was referred to the Select Committee on the subject.

On motion of Mr. W. THOMPSON, the report and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and 2,000 extra copies ordered to be printed.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the first Wednesday in June next be set apart by the House to the exclusion of all other business, for the bills, resolutions, &c. reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia to be acted upon.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

Mr. WILLIAMS then moved a suspension of the rules, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 73, nays 81.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BANKS asked the favor of the House to take up two short bills; which, he said, could be passed in two minutes.

Objections being made,

Mr. B. withdrew his request.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The unfinished business being the report of the Select Committee on the Public Printing, and the pending question from Wednesday last being on a motion for the previous question on an amendment offered by Mr. PETRIKIN, of Pennsylvania, to another amendment moved by Mr. EVANS, of Maine—

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his amendment.

The question, therefore, was still on the call for the previous question, but applicable now to Mr. EVAN's amendment, (which was that contained in a report from the minority of the committee.) That the state of the question may be more fully understood, we insert, first, the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee, and moved in the House by Mr. BLACK, their chairman; they are as follows:

Resolved, That the printing of Congress, unless when otherwise specially ordered, shall be done in the following manner and form, and to be paid for at the prices hereinafter set forth.

For the composition of every page of bills, 85 cents; of every page of small pica plain work, 85 cents; of every page of rule work, $1 70; of every page of brevier rule work, $2 98; and, for a larger form of brevier rule work, in proportion.

For the press work of bills, including paper, folding, and stitching, for fifty copies, 21¼ cents per page; for four hundred copies, $1 06¼ per page; for the press work of tables, other than those in the regular octavo form, for six hundred copies, including paper, folding, and stitching, $4 67½ per form; for the press work of the journals, of nine hundred copies, including paper, folding, and stitching, 85 cents per page; for all other printing in the octavo form, of six hundred copies, including paper, folding, and stitching, 74 4-10 cents per page; and for a larger or smaller number in proportion.

Resolved, That all bills shall be printed on cap or double cap "sized" paper, of quality equal to that on which bills are at present printed, and shall contain not less than 1,888 pica ems; joint resolutions shall be printed on the same paper, in the same type, and estimated in the same way as bills. Every octavo page of printing, in small pica, shall be executed on paper of royal or double royal size, of the same quality as now used, and shall contain not less than 1,732 ems; and every brevier page shall correspond with the above in size and quality, and shall contain not less than 3,060 ems. The orders of the day and calendar shall be printed in small pica type, on cap or double cap paper of the quality now used for bills; and each page shall contain not less than 3,325 ems: the composition thereof shall be paid for at and after the rate of price paid for royal octavo pages of small pica; and the press work thereof shall be paid for at the same rate as charged for the press work of bills.

All plain or figure work shall be set in small pica; and, when there are notes or side notes, they shall be set in brevier. All rule or rule-and-figure work shall be set in small pica, when it can be brought into pages in that type; and when it cannot be brought into pages in small pica, it shall be set in brevier; and, when it cannot be brought into pages with either, it shall be set in a brevier broadside.

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, one of the minority of the same committee, moved the following amendment, in conformity to the report of the minority of that committee:

"That, as it appears by the evidence, two offers have been made to execute the public printing for this House, one at the rate of 25 per cent. less than the price fixed by the joint resolution of March 3, 1819, and the other at the rate of 20 per cent. less than the said prices, this House do not deem it expedient to pay the printers thereof a higher rate of compensation than the prices at which other persons are willing to do the work who are competent to perform it:

Resolved, That the printing of the present House of Representatives, executed since the election of the printers to the House, and hereafter to be executed, shall be paid for at a reduction from the prices fixed by the joint resolution passed March 3, 1819, at the following rates, to wit:

	Per cent.
For the price for composition of every page of small pica, plain work, at a reduction of	10
Of every page of rule-work, small pica, at a reduction of	40
Of every page of brevier rule-work, at a reduction of	30
Of composition of all other kinds, at a reduction of	15
For the price of press work of every description, including paper, folding, stitching, including all materials and delivery at the Capitol, where the ordinary number of copies are required, at a reduction of	15
And where an extra number of copies, not exceeding 5,000, are required, at a reduction, on the extra numbers, of	30
And where more than 5,000 are required	40

Resolved, That the accounts for printing shall be made out as heretofore, at the prices fixed by the resolution of 1819; and, in another column, against the amounts carried out against each head of expense, shall be set down the reduction on each sum at the foregoing rates; and, in a third column, the nett amount to be paid agreeably to the foregoing resolution.

Resolved, That when the same document or paper is printed for both Houses of Congress, and the composition of the same is charged in the Senate's printing, no charge for composition shall be made in the House printing, except for such necessary alterations of head lines, &c. as is required."

On this amendment the previous question had been moved.

The question being about to be put on seconding the call for the previous question,

Mr. CHINN moved a call of the House.

The yeas and nays were demanded on this motion, and, being ordered, were taken, and resulted as follows—yeas 70, nays 105.

So the House refused the call.

Mr. BLACK rose, and wished to submit some remarks to the House; but, the previous question having been moved, he was called to order by many members, and also by the CHAIR; when he resumed his seat.

The call for the previous question was seconded, put, and carried; and, the question recurring on adopting the amendment of the minority, moved by Mr. EVANS, as a substitute for that of the majority, moved by Mr. BLACK,

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved to divide the question, and that the question be first put on striking out the report of the majority, and then on adopting the substitute. On this motion a discussion on order arose, in which Messrs. GARLAND, BANKS, and several other gentlemen took part: it was very irregular, several gentlemen rising at the same time.

The CHAIR decided that the question to strike out and insert was indivisible.

The resolution of the committee and the proposed substitute were then both read again.

The question was then put on adopting the substitute moved as an amendment by Mr. EVANS of Maine, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, J. W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, W. B Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Hall, Wm. S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Va. Hoffman, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnson, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, S. Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayney, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, E. D. White, John White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, A G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of N. C. Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Howard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, D. D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—107.

So the proposed substitute was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia presented the following, which he wished to move as a substitute for the resolutions of the majority, and asked that it might be read for the information of the House:

"Whereas, the House of Representatives has engaged certain individuals to do the printing, which is now in progress of execution, by which this House is laid under obligations to pay for the same, according to the fair and reasonable worth of the work and labor done and to be performed; and for as much as the prices thereof cannot now be fairly and justly determined by reference to the principle of lowest bidder, it is therefore

"Resolved, That the prices for printing of the House, during the present Congress, shall be fixed on the basis of those of 1819, with a reduction thereon of fifteen per cent.

The CHAIR decided that it was too late, the previous question having been ordered.

The question then recurring on the adopting the resolution reported by the majority of the committee, it was decided by yeas and nays as follows—yeas 175, nays 13:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, A. V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Anson Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Newhard, Osborne, Palen, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Reed, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, E. Rogers, Russell, Ryall, Shaw, Shepard, Simonton, A. Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Storrs, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taliaferro, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Edward D White, John White, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—175.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Barnard, Cushing, Dawson, Giddings, King, Ogle, Parris, Petrikin, Rariden, Sergeant, and Wise—13.

After the calling of the names of members had been gone through with,

Mr. CUSHING rose and said he had already voted, and in the negative, upon the printed copy of the resolutions before him; but it might be that the printed copy was erroneous, which was what he wished to know. As printed, the resolution, though only a House resolution, was in effect, according to its terms, a law of Congress, governing the Senate, and was therefore unconstitutional.

The SPEAKER said it was now too late to amend the resolution.

Mr. BLACK said he was quite willing that the error, which was a misprint, should be corrected by substituting for "the printing of Congress" that of the "House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER said it was now too late, unless by general consent.

Mr. BLACK. Then if there be no objection I move that it be corrected.

The motion was objected to by the Whig party generally.

Mr. B said: Then let it stand.

Mr. CUSHING then said that he must adhere to his vote in the negative.

So the report of the committee (in favor of fifteen per cent. reduction) was agreed to.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to recommit the residue of the report, viz: that part which relates to separating the public printing from the political press, with instructions to report the bill, a projet of which is contained in the minority's report.

Mr. BLACK reminded the House that the majority of the committee had reported no bill, but a resolution.

The reading, both of the bill proposed by the minority and also of the resolution reported by the majority, was demanded.

They were read accordingly.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WISE demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered and taken, and resulted as follows—yeas 104, nays 89.

So the subject of the separation of the printing from newspaper establishments was laid on the table.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he rose for the purpose of enabling him to submit a motion, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. said, in so doing, he deemed it fair and proper to state, that in case the House should go into committee, he would then ask the committee to take up the Independent Treasury bill. He expressed a hope that he should have the co-operation, not only of the friends of the measure, but also of its opponents, who, on other occasions, had expressed their apprehensions, that it was the intention of the supporters of this Administration not to act upon the bill at the present session of Congress. He concluded by submitting his motion to suspend the rules, and on it he asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON wished to know if the gentleman from Virginia would not consent to modify his motion so as to embrace other business.

Mr. WISE wished to have a fair understanding on the matter. If this was a motion to go into committee on a particular subject, he would oppose it; but if the motion to go into committee was general, he would support it.

Mr. JONES explained that his motion was to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole generally. But he had expressed his intention, in case the motion should be carried, to ask the committee to take up the Independent Treasury bill.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: yeas 117, nays 83; not two thirds:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Bynum, Wm. B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dawson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Gaibraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hilten, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thos. Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—117.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Rice Garland, Gates, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Green, Grinnell, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnson, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—83.

So the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, the House then proceeded to the orders of the day.

The following engrossed bills were taken up, read the third time, and passed, viz:

A bill for the relief of William J. Roberts and William Detherage;

A bill for the relief of John Roberts; and

A bill for the relief of the widow and children of William Grant Davidson.

The bill entitled "An act to amend an act to remit duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in the city of New York in December, 1835," passed July 7, 1838, was taken up on the question, Shall it be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. CURTIS moved an amendment, providing that all appropriations for relief under this act, and the act to which this is a supplement, shall be filed with the commissioner in six months after the passage of this act.

Mr. RHETT moved an amendment to the amendment, so as to make the principle of relief in the bill general—to make it extend to other cities where goods have been destroyed by fire.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and rejected.

The question recurring on the original amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS moved the previous question on ordering the bill to be engrossed.

Mr. RHETT moved a call of the House; which the House refused.

Mr. CONNOR moved to lay the bill on the table, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 73, nays 93.

So the House refused to lay it upon the table.

Mr. PARRIS moved a called of the House; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 69 nays 100.

The call was refused.

The previous question was seconded; and the question being, "Shall the main question be ordered?"

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The main question was then ordered; which was, "Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?" and on that motion,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 87, nays 80.

The bill having been engrossed, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce, and made some remarks in support of the motion.

Mr. PROFFIT called for the previous question, which was seconded—ayes 65, noes 63.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 69, nays 83, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Brockway, Carroll, Chinn, Crittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Dellet, Doig, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Floyd, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goode, Graves, Grinnell, Hand, W. S. Hastings, Hawes, Hillen, Hoffman, Howard, James, Kemble, Lincoln, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Ogle, Peck, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Vanderpoel, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Wise—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Burke, William B. Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Davee, John Davis, Dawson, Doan, Duncan, Eastman, Fornance, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, John Hastings, Hawkins, John Hill of N. C. Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hubbard, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pope, Ramsey, Rhett, Ryall, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taliaferro, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Turney, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Lewis Williams—83.

So the main question was not ordered.

The effect of this vote, by the rule, was to put the bill from under the consideration of the House for this day.

Mr. HUBBARD moved that the House adjourn; which motion, by yeas 37, nays 89, was rejected.

On motion of Mr. R. GARLAND, the bill for the relief of Mary Tucker, was postponed till Saturday week.

Mr. RUSSELL moved that the House go into committee on the bills enumerated on the three first pages of the private calendar; on which motion no quorum voted.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a call of the House.

Mr. HUBBARD moved an adjournment, but subsequently withdrew the motion.

After some conversation between Messrs. STANLY, PETRIKIN, and BRIGGS—

Mr. BRIGGS asked the yeas and nays on the motion that there be a call of the House, which were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 79, nays 51.

So the call was ordered.

And, a quorum being now present, Mr. BRIGGS moved to suspend proceedings on the call.

Mr. ANDREWS asked the yeas and nays on that motion. He was not disposed to trifle; and if gentlemen would have a call of the House, let them go through with it.

Mr. BRIGGS then withdrew his motion to suspend; and the call proceeded, when 136 answered to their names.

Mr. BANKS said there was a quorum present; if there was any intention to do the private business, they had better dispense with all further proceedings in the call: he moved to suspend further proceedings.

Mr. ANDREWS asked the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked for tellers; but the call was not sustained.

Mr. HUBBARD said many gentlemen had gone out of the House since they had answered to their names on the call of the roll.

And the question being then taken on the motion to suspend all further proceedings on the call, it prevailed by the vote of 80 to 21, a majority of the members present, but no quorum voted.

Mr. R. GARLAND then renewed the motion that the House go into committee.

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays, which ordered, and, being taken, were, yeas 123, nays 0.

So the motion was agreed to; and a quorum was ascertained to be present.

And, at four o'clock, after an hour and a half spent in motions to adjourn, and a call of the House, the House went into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BRIGGS of Massachusetts in the chair) on the three first pages of the private calendar.

The committee took up the bill for the relief of Andrew Law, assignee of Law, Taylor, and Co.

The report having been read—

After some remarks from Messrs. PETRIKIN and M. A. COOPER,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the enacting clause.

A discussion followed, in which Messrs. ADAMS, DAWSON, M. A. COOPER, CRAIG, and SERGEANT, participated in favor of the bill, and Messrs. RHETT and PETRIKIN in opposition.

The question on the motion to strike out the enacting clause was taken, and the vote stood—ayes 40, noes 60—no quorum voting.

The CHAIR requested the members without the bar to come within the bar and vote; when a count having been again taken, the vote stood, yeas 40, nays 56; (still no quorum voting.)

The committee then rose, and the chairman reported to the House that the committee found itself without a quorum.

Mr. HUBBARD (at a quarter before 5) moved that the House adjourn. On which motion, Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were, yeas 43, nays 68.

So the House refused to adjourn.

And, after several ineffectual motions for a call of the House, yeas and nays, &c.

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, May 16, 1840.

Messrs. C. H. WILLIAMS and BANKS, by consent, presented additional testimony in relation to claims now before committees.

Mr. BRIGGS made some remarks in relation to the unconstitutionality of the resolutions passed by the House on yesterday, reducing the price of the public printing fifteen per cent. He argued that, in its present form, it would be a perfect nullity; inasmuch as the House could not, by a simple resolution, annul the law of Congress fixing the prices. For these, and other considerations, he moved a reconsideration of the vote on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana made a few remarks to show the importance of transacting the business of the country; and, to attain that end, moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. EVERETT inquired of the CHAIR whether, if the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider prevailed, it did not suspend the operation of the resolution.

The CHAIR was understood to say that it suspended its passage.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and were—yeas 72, nays 94.

The question recurring on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table;

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he would withdraw that motion; and moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider; which motion received a second; and the main question having been ordered, which main question was, "Shall the vote be reconsidered?"

Mr. RANDOLPH demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 84, nays 93. So the House refused to reconsider the vote.

Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after Monday next, this House will take a daily recess from two till half past three, p. m.

Objection being made,

Mr. DAVIS moved a suspension of the rules.

On that motion, Mr. HOFFMAN demanded the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were—yeas 130, nays 40.

So the rules were suspended.

And the question recurring on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved to amend, by inserting "half past two till four o'clock."

Mr. DAVIS accepted this as a modification of his resolution, and the question being on the adoption of the resolution as modified,

Mr. BARNARD moved further to amend, by a resolution providing that on and after Monday next, the House do meet at 10, a. m. and adjourn at 4, p. m. which was disagreed to.

The previous question on the resolution was then moved, put, and carried, and the resolution agreed to without a count.

So on and after Monday next, the House will take a daily recess from half past two till four p. m.

Mr. McKAY said there had been a letter received this morning, and laid on the table, from Messrs. Blair and Rives, in relation to the prices paid for the public printing; and asking that the prices for figure work and brevier might be fixed. He wished that letter referred to the Select Committee, of which the gentleman from Georgia was a member, with instructions to report thereon. He accordingly made a motion to that effect.

Mr. PROFFIT objected, and the motion could not be then entertained.

Mr. BANKS, on leave, presented, on behalf of Mr. CAMPBELL, then absent on the Committee of Elections, certain evidence in relation to the erection of a beacon and light-house, near Georgetown, South Carolina, which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS, of Kentucky, moved to amend the 93th Rule of the House, so as to appoint a standing committee on the public printing.

Objection being made,

Mr. DAVIS moved a suspension of the rules, which motion was negatived.

The SPEAKER then called on the standing committees for reports; when

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee of Claims, reported back to the House, with an amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of H. Lucas; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Also, reported back to the House, with an amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of Alfred P. King; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURKE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Also, reported back to the House, without amendment, joint resolution of the Senate directing the purchase of 250 copies of Jones's Digest of the Tariff, to be deposited in the library of Congress; which was read; and

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, who made some remarks in opposition to it, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill confirming to the Territory of Iowa a tract of land for the purpose of erecting public buildings thereon; which was read twice; and

On motion of Mr. L. who said the bill was a mere matter of form, it having been engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. L. from the same committee, reported a bill granting to the county of Johnson, in the Territory of Iowa, the right of pre-emption to a tract of land for a seat of justice for the said county; and repealing the 2d section of the act heretofore passed on the 3d of March, 1819, entitled an act making a donation of land to the Territory of Iowa, for the purpose of erecting public buildings thereon; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to authorize the registers and receiver of the land officers to administer all the oaths necessary to persons, in relation to the entry and purchase of land.

After a few remarks by Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama, to press the passage of the bill immediately,

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana inquired whether any provision was made in the bill to fix the fees for administering the oaths; which he said should be done.

Mr. MASON was understood to reply in the negative.

After a few remarks from Mr. UNDERWOOD,

Mr. R. GARLAND contended that some provision should be made to fix the fees for administering the oath as intimated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS.] The registers and receivers, he said, were in the habit of charging whatever they pleased as fees. He knew a case in his district where one of those officers charged a gentleman $22 as fees for the entry of forty acres of land under the pre-emption act.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana then moved an amendment, providing that the registers and receivers should not directly or indirectly receive any compensation for administering such oaths; which was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then made further objections to the bill, and

After a few remarks by Messrs. REYNOLDS and CRARY, a verbal amendment was made to the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an amendment, making it the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to give information to any individual who may make application for that purpose, of the name and residence of the persons owning lands in any section of the country.

Mr. CUSHING objected to the amendment. It would give speculators, by the information that they might obtain from the Commissioner, an opportunity to impose upon the old soldiers who had received bounty lands from the United States.

Mr. REYNOLDS said, if the Commissioner was bound to answer all the letters for information from every part of the United States, consequent upon the passage of such a provision, it would consume all his time. He coincided with the views expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] He might speculate himself occasionally, but he did not consider it right to afford an opportunity to these speculating gentlemen to impose upon the old soldiers.

After a few further remarks by Mr. CUSHING in opposition to the amendment,

Mr. STEWART said he represented a district which was much interested in this provision. He argued that it would not be for the benefit of the speculators, as intimated; but that he had received letters from farmers who were not speculators, calling for information of the kind which this amendment was intended to meet. He had introduced a resolution calling upon the Commissioner for all the information, giving the names and the residence of the landholders, which was adopted by the House. He contended that it would be for the benefit of the old soldiers, many of whom had their lands sold for taxes under the laws of Illinois; and who, in all probability, were not aware of that fact; and were barred from any claim to the lands thus sold after the expiration of a certain period. And if the information of the names of the persons and residence could be known, such a result might be prevented.

Mr. MASON argued that the information on the public records should be made free to all; that it should not be locked up, subject to the disposition of the Commissioner. The power of the Commissioner might be converted to a species of favoritism. He might, if he chose, give information of the kind required to a friend, and withhold it from an enemy. He was in favor of the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CASEY did not consider the amendment necessary, inasmuch as all the information which could be required would be reported to the House under the resolution preported by his colleague, [Mr. STEWART,] and would be free for the whole country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD replied that the information under that resolution would apply only to military lands.

Mr. CASEY said the rule of the Deparment refusing information did not apply except to military lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was not aware of that fact. The amendment would however do no harm.

Mr. HUBBARD said the question was one totally disconnected with this bill. He moved the previous question, which was amended, and the main question ordered; which main question being first on the adoption of the amendment,

The question was taken by tellers (Messrs. JOHNSON of Maryland and HOWARD acting as such) who reported—ayes 55, noes 90; so the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, it was carried in the affirmative; and the bill having been engrossed, it was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers of the late war to surrender bounty lands drawn by them, and to enter others in lieu thereof, and for other purposes; which was read the third time by special order, and passed.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, reported back to the House, with an amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to discontinue the office of Surveyor General in the several land districts so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, and for abolishing the land offices, under certain circumstances; and for other purposes; the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act authorizing the relinquishment of the 16th sections, granted for the use of public schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof; which was committed.

The morning hour having expired, to which the reception of reports of committees was confined,

Mr. MASON of Ohio moved to suspend the rules, to submit a motion that another hour be granted to the committees to report; and the question being put, the House refused to suspend the rules for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, the House then passed to the orders of the day.

Engrossed Senate bills on the Speaker's table, of the following titles, were then taken up and passed, viz:

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of David Stone;

An act authorizing Sippican and Mattapoisett, within the township of Rochester, in the State of Massachusetts, to be known hereafter as ports of entry, under those names.

Joint resolution of the Senate, authorizing the appointment of a Select Committee to investigate into the contract of the late Secretary of State, Edward Livingston, with Clark and Force, for the compilation and publication of a Documentary History of the United States, was read twice, and, by special order, the third time, and passed; and,

On motion of Mr. EVANS, a committee of five was appointed on the part of the House.

The bill next in order was the bill explanatory of the act for the relief of sufferers by the great fire at New York. The bill having been previously read a third time,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question on its passage.

The call for the previous question being seconded, the main question was ordered to be put. And the main question being on the passage of the bill, it was taken by yeas and nays as follows: yeas 80, nays 95.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. GRIFFIN of South Carolina moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had been rejected.

On that motion Mr. HUBBARD called the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

And on the main question, (being on the motion to reconsider,) Mr. CONNOR demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 78, nays 96.

So the House refused to reconsider.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of private bills on the calendar.

The first bill in order was the bill for the relief of the assignee of Law, Taylor and Co.

The question pending being on the motion to strike out the enacting clause, it was opposed by Messrs. EVERETT, RHETT, HABERSHAM, and COOPER of Georgia.

The question then being taken on the motion to strike out, the ayes were 35, and the noes 72—no quorum.

The committee then rose, and the Chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. WISE said it was a notorious fact, that on private bill days there was seldom or ever a quorum; and if gentlemen would persist in dividing the committee, gross injustice would be done to the parties concerned. He therefore moved an adjournment.

On the motion, Mr. ANDREWS demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. WISE said, if the House would, by common consent, go back into Committee of the Whole, he would withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ANDREWS said he would not consent to any such arrangement. The House had power to compel the attendance of members, and he wished the power to be exercised.

Mr. WISE. Then I will not withdraw the motion.

The question on the motion to adjourn was then taken by tellers, and resulted—ayes 50, noes 61.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN moved a call of the House.

On that motion, Mr. ANDREWS demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered were—yeas 54, nays 68.

So the call was not ordered.

A quorum being now present the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the bill pending which it had risen.

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his motion for a division on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The question on striking out was then taken, and negatived without a count, and the bill laid aside to be reported.

The next bill was a bill for the relief of Benjamin Adams and Co. and others.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the enacting clause, and in advocating the motion, he was quoting, in a general way, what had formerly been said on the floor of the House, relative to the waste and extravagance of the Democratic party and the present Administration; and that, when the Whigs were told they had voted for the bills granting the sums complained of as extravagant, they replied that the Democrats had the majority, and ought to have prevented the passage of all improper laws: "Pass these bills, voting away a million of money, and we will be again told, 'the Democracy had the majority in the House of Representatives; why did they pass such bills?'" Mr. P. was called to order by the CHAIR for irrelevancy.

Mr. PETRIKIN contended that he was in order, inasmuch as he intended to show that the passage of this bill was impolitic, and wrong in principle. He therefore took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR.

And the question being on the appeal, some debate arose between Messrs. MORGAN, GARLAND of Louisiana, DAVIS, and others, as to whether the appeal was debatable.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana referred to the rule of the House, which declares that an appeal is not debatable.

The question was then taken by tellers on sustaining the decision of the CHAIR, and resulted—ayes 67, noes 53: no quorum.

The committee then rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. ANDREWS gave notice that he would, on Monday, move a reconsideration of the vote, by which the House had ordered a daily recess.

Mr. WELLER moved an adjournment.

On that motion, the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 63, nays 60.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, May 18, 1840.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the establishment of ports of entry in the States of Missouri and Arkansas, and to allow debenture in certain cases; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the documents connected therewith ordered to be printed.

Mr. K. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of David E. Brockett; which was agreed to.

Mr. K. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of various memorials in relation to a new custom-house in the city of Philadelphia; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That, after to-day, the Senate will take a daily recess from half past 2 o'clock, p. m. to 4 o'clock, p. m.

The bill for the relief of Francis Cazeau was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Richard Robertson was taken up, as in committee of the whole, and, after being discussed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, WILLIAMS, HUBBARD, and TAPPAN, was indefinitely postponed—yeas 21, noes 12.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States being taken up,

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the substitute proposed by Mr. WALL, and in favor of the bill reported by a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STRANGE intimating an intention to address the Senate on the subject, it was informally passed over.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business;

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, May 18, 1840.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. ATHERTON said he rose for the purpose of submitting a motion to suspend the rules to enable him to make a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the bill from the Senate, commonly called the Independent Treasury Bill. He accordingly made the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. CUSHING objected to that motion.

Mr. LINCOLN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which were ordered.

Mr. EVANS said there was a very thin House, and he therefore moved a call; and, on that motion, demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 86, nays 48. So the House determined to have a call; which was proceeded in, and 182 answered to their names. The list of absentees was then called over until,

On motion of Mr. LEET, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with.

The question then recurred on the motion to suspend the rules; which having been taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 105, nays 77. So the rules were not supended.

Mr. ATHERTON then moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing a resolution in substance that the House would, on to-morrow, at the hour of twelve o'clock, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the Independent Treasury Bill, and that it be made the special order for that day, and every subsequent day, from the same hour, to take precedence of all other business until disposed of.

Mr. R. GARLAND inquired of the CHAIR whether it would not be in order on to-morrow to move the resolution?

The CHAIR said it would not, except on a suspension of the rules for that purpose, the bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BELL, to secure the freedom of elections, being the first business in order on the calendar.

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 105, nays 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Brewster, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—79.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. MONROE of New York made a motion to suspend the rules to enable him to move a resolution that the House would on to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, and every subsequent day, except Fridays and Saturdays, at the same hour, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the several appropriation bills in the order in which they stand on the calendar; and that said bills be made the special order to take precedence of all other business until disposed of, excepting private bill days; and that then the Independent Treasury bill should be taken up and disposed of after the same manner.

Mr. R. GARLAND said the resolution would not change the order of business. These bills came up as a matter of course.

Mr. ADAMS moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McKAY inquired if it was in order to do a thing by resolution which was already provided for.

The CHAIR said the gentleman had made a motion to suspend the rules for that purpose, which was in order.

Mr. TURNEY hoped the rules would be suspended.

Mr. MONROE having modified his resolution, after some conversation, withdrew it.

The SPEAKER announced that this being the day set apart by the rules for the reception of resolutions, he would proceed to call the States for that purpose; but

On motion, the rules were suspended for the purpose of presenting petitions; when

The SPEAKER called the States for that purpose, commencing with the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. H. said that upon presenting these memorials, he would claim the indulgence of the House to submit a single remark, though strictly out of order. He wished to call the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary particularly to the subject of the memorials. It was one of more general and engrossing interest than any now before the country, and in his estimation called for immediate action of the House committee, without waiting the progress of the propositions on the subject of bankruptcy, now pending before the other branch of the National Legislature.

He, therefore, wished to bespeak the immediate attention of the Judiciary Committee to the subject, and without further trespassing upon the kindness of the House, would move the reference [of the memorials to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the memorial of 146 citizens of the town of Brunswick, county of Rensselaer, New York, asking the House of Representatives to inquire into the case of William Lyon Mackenzie, imprisoned at Rochester, New York, under sentence from one of the Federal courts, for a violation of the neutrality laws of the Government; and intercede for the release of said Mackenzie.

Mr. H. said that, since receiving said memorial, and before any opportunity had been presented of offering the same to the House, he had perceived from the public journals that the prayer of the memorialists had been complied with by the Executive of the country, and he therefore would move to lay the memorial upon the table.

Mr. H. also stated that he had in his possession resolutions from the Legislature of his own State, in relation to the national domain, and also in reference to the consent of the State to the construction by the General Government of a ship canal around the Niagara Falls, and urging the passage by Congress of a law for that purpose, but he would forbear sending said resolutions to the table, as similar ones had already been presented by those who had preceded him this morning.]

Mr. RANDOLPH of New Jersey presented a petition from certain citizens of that State, praying that the nett proceeds of the public lands be distributed among the several States. The memorialists also pray that a port of entry may be established at the town of Green Bay. Mr. L. moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Territories, which was agreed to.]

He had not the pleasure of knowing them, but he presumed they were very respectable, as all his constituents were. He regretted that they were disturbed about slavery in the District of Columbia. As it would be against the rule adopted in reference to slavery, he would not press its reference.]

The petitioners further state that they secured and delivered supplies to the amount of $5,454 48, and that they have received from the Government $4,000, and that the balance has been retained by the officers of the Government; and it is against this decission of the officers of Government that the petitioners protest, and ask the interference of the Congress of the United States: referred to the Committee on Claims.]

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, asked to be discharged from the consideration of the claim of the heir of Thomas Farrar, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Washington, stating that they labor under great inconvenience, in consequence of the banks of the District refusing to fulfil their obligations to the public, and praying Congress to take such measures as may compel a resumption of specie payments; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of the Southern Steampacket Company of the city of Charleston, praying compensation for transporting the United States mail, under the authority of the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the memorial of James Leary and others, hat manufacturers of the city of New York.

Mr. C. said, the grievance of which they complain is, that silk hats, and the unfinished body of fur hats, are admitted duty free, contrary, as they believe, to the true meaning of the compromise act; and the relief asked is, the passage of a bill to restore the protection to which they think they are entitled. The petition is numerously signed, there being nearly a thousand names affixed, all, as he was informed, engaged in the hatter's business.

It may be asked, why he had been selected by so numerous and respectable a body of citizens, belonging to another and distant State, to present their petition, when his opposition to a protective tariff was so well known. He could assign but one reason, and that was, that they concurred with him in the opinion that the necessity for protection originated in an unsound currency; and that all that was required to afford ample protection against competition from any quarter, was a sound uniform, and stable currency. The petition was drawn up with ability, by a mechanic, as he was assured, but whose good sense and sound discriminating judgment would do him credit in this or any other body. That he should be thus supported, in so important a position, by such a body of men, so deeply interested, and capable of judging correctly of their interests, and that they should select him to present their petition on account of the accordance of their views with his, was not a little gratifying to him. It gave additional assurance of future peace and harmony between the different portions of the Union. It is well to speak plainly. We shall never see peace and harmony within our borders, till the tariff question is satisfactorily adjusted; and it can never be satisfactorily adjusted but through the currency question. He had long seen that the currency was at the bottom of that vexed question; and it gave him new hopes, to see the same opinion spreading in other quarters, and especially in that from which this able petition comes. He hoped that it would receive the serious attention of the Senate; and in order that the members might have an opportunity to read it at their leisure, he moved that it should be printed for their use, and referred to the Committee on Manufactures for consideration; which was accordingly ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of the widow of Joseph S. Cannon.

Mr. PIERCE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Whereas it is apparent that great frauds have been practised within the last four years upon Congress on claims growing out of Revolutionary services; and whereas the Government, in consequence of a large portion of its records being lost by fire o otherwise, has no adequate means of protection against such frauds, therefore

Resolved, (as the opinion of the Senate,) That it is just and expedient to insist upon the bar interposed by the statute of limitations for all claims for the payment of which provision was made prior to 1800, unless the claimant shall first make a satisfactory explanation of the causes of delay since that period, and sustain his application by documentary testimony.

The bill to provide for satisfying outstanding claims to bounty lands for military services during the last war with Great Britain, and for other purposes, was taken up; and after an animated discussion, in which Messrs. PRENTISS, SEVIER, YOUNG, BENTON, HUBBARD, CLAY of Kentucky, SMITH of Indiana, and WALKER, participated, was postponed until to-morrow.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The Senate again proceeded to consider the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. The question being on Mr. WALL's substitute for the bill—

Mr. STRANGE having stated that he differed in his views on this subject from all the rest of the committee, proceeded to exhibit and illustrate them at large, and was understood to come to the conclusion that the subject was involved in very great, if not insurmountable difficulties; that the same objections which went against bringing such a law to bear upon banks and other State corporations, went with equal force and clearness against its application to individuals; and that, if any were included, all ought to be included.

Mr. NORVELL having signified his desire to speak briefly on the subject—

The bill, by consent, was laid over till to-morrow.

And the Senate adjourned.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked the House to excuse him from serving on the Joint Committee in relation to the contract with Clark and Force, for the publication of the Documentary History of the United States. His first reason for wishing to be excused was, that his duties on other committees would not allow him to give that attention to the subject which it merited; and the second was, that he had some personal feeling on the subject, which should not be brought to bear. Mr. P. was accordingly excused.

CONVENTION WITH MEXICO.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, (the rules having been suspended for the purpose,) the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, [Mr. J. GARLAND in the chair,] on the bill heretofore reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled "A bill to carry into effect a convention between the United States and the Mexican Republic."

The bill having been read—

Mr. CUSHING said he would not detain the House further than to say a few words in explanation of the reasons why, under the direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he had called up this bill for action.

It was known that much time had elapsed in obtaining a treaty with Mexico for the liquidation of the claims of our citizens. A treaty had at length been concluded upon just and equitable terms. One of the provisions of it was that the joint commission to be appointed under it should be appointed and should actually assemble at Washington within three months after the exchange of the ratification of the treaty. That exchange took place on the 7th of April, and, therefore, the commissioners, under the treaty, must be appointed and must actually assemble here within three months of that time. Otherwise, the treaty would be at an end, and, of course, the relations between the United States and Mexico would again be thrown out to sea. It was important, therefore, that the bill should be speedily passed, in order that the President might make the appointments, and that the commission should assemble.

There was also another reason. The treaty provided that the two Government should address a joint note to the King of Prussia, inviting him to act as arbiter under the treaty, and, if he declined to act, that the Queen of Great Britain or the King of the Netherlands should be invited to act in that capacity. He was authorized to state that the King of Prussia had consented to act as arbiter, and therefore that difficulty was removed. He had also received information from Mexico, through a private source, that the two commissioners on the part of that Republic had been appointed—Mr. Posada and Mr. Castillo—gentlemen of distinction in that country, who might be expected speedily; and it might lead to much inconvenience if the commissioners on our part were not appointed. Therefore, without going into the details of the bill, unless some objection was made to it, he would submit it without further comment to the decision of the committee.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS suggested that the salary of $3,500 provided by this bill for each of the commissioners was greater than it ought to be.

Mr. CUSHING entered into some explanations as to the arduous and peculiar character of the duties imposed upon the commissioners, &c.; and said that, under all circumstances, the Committee of Ways and Means had come to the decision that the salary of $3,500 was appropriate. The commissioners appointed under various other treaties had received salaries of either $3,000 or $3,500; but he was not aware that the amount in any case had been less than $3,000.

Mr. RICE GARLAND inquired of Mr. CUSHING what might be the probable amount of claims upon the Mexican Government, as some of his constituents had a good deal of interest in them. He wished also to know what was to be the probable value of the Mexican Treasury notes provided for in the 9th section. If he understood the condition of the Mexican Treasury, and the rate at which their stocks, bonds, &c. were sold, they were not at a very high rate; and he wished to know whether there were any provisions entered into by which the Treasury notes to be issued by that Government were to be of any more value than their other stocks and securites, or whether the claimants were to be put off with these notes at the same rate of value as the bonds, &c. bore, namely, a reduction of about 30 per cent.

Mr. CUSHING was not able to state the specific aggregate amount of the claims by citizens of the United States, because many of the amounts were unliquidated. But he referred Mr. G. to a document which would exhibit an enumeration of the various claims, with a calculation as to the amount, &c.

As to the other point—the value of the Mexican Treasury notes—Mr. C. said he knew that Mexican bonds and other credits were at a great depreciation. The reason of that was to be found not alone in the exhausted state of the Mexican Treasury, but in the fact that there was no fixed means or provision for the payment of these bonds; they depended on the solvency and general good faith of the Mexican Republic. And if this treaty were silent on that point, he should esteem it of much less value than he did now.

Mr. C. then explained that there was a provision in the treaty which, to a certain degree, avoided that difficulty, by making these Treasury notes directly chargeable upon a given source of revenue, (to wit, the duties not only on imports but exports,) so as to leave a fair and reasonable prospect in relation to them.

On motion of Mr. C. there being no further proposition to amend, the committee then rose, and the bill was reported to the House.

The question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in the amendment reducing the salary of the commissioners from $3,500 to $3,000,

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays on that question; which were refused.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment of the committee was then concurred in.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and having been engrossed, was read a third time, and passed, as follows:

"A BILL to carry into effect a convention between the United States and the Mexican Republic.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint two commissioners, who, together with two commissioners to be appointed by the President of the Mexican Republic, shall form a board, whose duty it shall be to receive and examine all claims which are provided for by the convention between the United States and the Mexican Republic, concluded at Washington on the eleventh day of April, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, and which may be presented to said commissioners under the same, and to decide thereon according to the provisions of said convention, and the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a secretary to said commissioners, in behalf of the United States, versed in the English and Spanish languages.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners on the part of the United States, in conjunction with the commissioners on the part of the Mexican Republic, shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for conducting the business of their said commissions, such rules and regulations not contravening the Constitution of the United States, the provisions of this act, or the provisions of said convention.

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the respective officers, for whose appointment provision is made by this act, shall not exceed the following sums, namely: To said commissioners, at the rate of three thousand dollars per annum for each; to the secretary, at the rate of two thousand per annum. And the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such provision for the contingent expenses of the said commission on the part of the United States as shall to him appear to be reasonable and proper; and the said salaries and expenses, and likewise all that part of the salary and expenses of the arbiter under said convention which is required thereby to be defrayed by the United States, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all communications to and from the secretary of said commissioners appointed under this act, on the business of the commission, shall pass by the mail free of postage.

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That so soon as said commission shall be executed and completed according to the provisions of said convention, the commissioners aforesaid shall report to the Secretary of State a list of all the several awards made by them; and the records, documents, and all other papers in the possession of the commission or its officers, or certified copies or duplicates thereof, shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

"SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State shall transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of the report of said commissioners, or of the award of the arbiter or umpire, as provided by said convention to be made in case of the disagreement of said commissioners; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause certificates to be issued, in such form as he may prescribe, showing the amount or proportion of compensation to which each person, in whose favor award shall have been made by said commissioners or umpire, may be entitled as against the Mexican Government on account of the claims provided for by said convention.

"SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is hereby authorized and required, to cause any moneys which may be paid by the Mexican Government in satisfaction of said awards, to be remitted on the most advantageous terms to the United States; and all moneys received under said convention, or by virtue of this act, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and the same are hereby appropriated, to be distributed and paid to those entitled thereto according to the provisions of this act; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall distribute the same, in ratable proportions, among the persons aforesaid, according to the proportions which their respective awards shall bear to the whole amount received, and at such time or times as the same shall be received into the Treasury.

"SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That if the Mexican Government, in place of at once paying the amount of said awards, shall see fit to issue Treasury notes therefor as provided by said convention, then it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is hereby authorized and required to receive the said Treasury notes, and to deliver the same to the persons who shall be respectively entitled thereto, in virtue of the awards made under said convention, and of the certificates issued as hereinbefore provided.

"SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, in the payment of money or the issue of certificates in virtue of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall first deduct and retain, or make reservation of, such sums of money, if any, as may be due the United States from persons in whose favor awards shall have been made under said convention."

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was sent to the chair, and read for the information of the House as follows:

Whereas it is desirable to bring the present session to an early termination, and with that view to provide for the speedy and orderly disposal of all such business as is indispensable or most urgently necessary:

Resolved, That on to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, this House will go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the following bills in the following order, viz: Bill No. 6, making appropriations for the naval service; No. 5, making appropriations for the support of the army; No. 4, making appropriations for the Indian Department; and the other appropriation bills and joint resolutions making appropriations, that have been and may be referred to said Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in the order in which they were or may referred; and will, on each day thereafter, excepting the days set apart by the rules for private business and petitions, go into such Committee of the Whole at the same hour, and for the same purpose, until said bills and joint resolutions are disposed of; and that, until disposed of, they have precedence, in the order aforesaid, over all other business at and from said hour on each day, except the days hereinbefore excepted.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected.

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved to suspend the rules; and on that motion,

Mr. CONNOR demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table.

Mr. TURNEY inquired of the CHAIR whether it would be in order to amend the resolution if the rules were suspended, so as to substitute the Sub-Treasury bill for either of the bills included in the resolution.

The CHAIR replied that it would be in order so to do; but that it would require a vote of two-thirds to adopt the resolution, inasmuch as it changed the order of business on the calendar.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, after some consultation, withdrew his resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit the report of the Secretary of War, furnishing a statement of the amounts paid to persons concerned in negotiating Indian treaties prior to 1829, etc. which completes the information called for by the resolution of the House of Representatives, dated the 28th January, 1839, upon that subject, and the disbursing officers in the War Department.

On motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS, it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr MONTGOMERY,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Mary Rand, of Wake county, North Carolina, for the services of her husband, Walter Rand, in the Revolutionary war; also, that the papers, now in the Pension office, be referred to said committee.

On motion of Mr. JAMES,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions inquire into the expediency of passing a law for the payment of the pension due to Jacob Wisner, from the time his name was suspended or stricken from the pension roll, by the Commissioner of Pensions, until it was restored again to said roll.

On motion by Mr. MONROE,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of having constructed a steam vessel, under the direction of the Secretary of War, not to cost more than $30,000, upon the principle of the horizontal wheel, suggested by Lieut. Wm. W. Hunter.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, by universal consent, reported back to the House, with amendments, Senate bill entitled an act to extend, for a longer time, the several acts now in force for the relief of the insolvent debtors of the United States.

Mr. S. said the bill contained no appropriation, and it was not, therefore, necessary to commit it; he hoped that it would be acted on immediately.

The House agreed to consider the bill at that time; and the amendments of the committee having been concurred in, and the bill having been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, it was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the morning hour having expired, the House passed to the orders of the day.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to postpone all preceding orders so as to go into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union until the first bill taken up by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall be finally disposed of.

The SPEAKER, in answer to an inquiry from Mr. WISE, said a vote of two-thirds would be requisite to accomplish the object of the motion.

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays on the proposition; which were ordered, and were—yeas 116, nays 85.

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, A. V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. White, John White, Thos. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—85.

So the rules were not suspended.

Various Senate bills on the SPEAKER's table were taken up, read twice, and appropriately referred.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order on the calendar was the bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] to "secure the freedom of elections."

Mr. GENTRY who was entitled to the floor on the above bill, without discussing the principles involved in it, replied with much pungency to the remarks of his colleague [Mr. WATTERSON] when the bill was last up. He charged his colleague with being a new convert to Democracy, and that he had supported Judge White as an Opposition candidate. In the course of his remarks he was twice called to order by the SPEAKER, for irrelevancy of debate; when

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to his proceeding.

Mr. WATTERSON hoped that his colleague would be permitted to proceed in his own way.

Mr. GENTRY said it was not his wish to violate any rule of the House; but it was impossible to reply to the remarks of his colleague in order.

The question was then taken whether Mr. G. should proceed in his remarks, and it was determed in the affirmative—there being only three opposed to his procceding.

Mr. G. then finished his remarks in reply to his colleague [Mr. WATTERSON] and in an examination of his political course, to prove his inconsistency. After which he went into a defence of General Harrison from the charges against him, particularly with reference to the identity of his principles with those of the Abolitionists.

He repelled the idea that he was an Abolitionist; and said he did not believe that there was a gentleman in the House who believed that General Harrison was an Abolitionist, notwithstanding some had garbled his speeches to make it appear that he was one.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia interrupted Mr. G. and was understood to say, in substance, that whether the charge against Gen. Harrison that he was an Abolitionist were well founded or not, was perfectly immaterial. It was a well known fact that he was supported by the Abolitionists; and if he came into power by the support of that party, he would be influenced by that party to a greater or less degree, and would be compelled to yield the policy of his administration to the wishes of that party.

Mr. GENTRY was proceeding to deny the position assumed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOPER;] but before he had finished, the hour arrived for the House to take a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked for a count of the House; which was had, and it appeared that there were but thirty-three members in their seats.

Mr. GENTRY resumed his remarks. He contended that the Abolitionists did not belong exclusively to either party; but that they had affected a separate organization. Mr. G. justified the rallying cry of "log cabins" and "hard cider," now used by the Whig party, on the ground that it deprived the Administration of one of its most successful means of influence by which they appealed to the prejudices of the people, and met it on its own mode of warfare. He agreed with his colleague [Mr. BELL] that the evils which this bill was intended to remedy were of great magnitude; but he did not believe, though the bill was one of great magnitude, that it would be fully efficacious—that it would accomplish the end desired. The only effectual remedy for the evil would be found in an enlightened public sentiment, or through the ballot box, or by altering the Constitution, so as to have but one Presidential term; or by making some statutory provision limiting the appointing power; or by restricting the power of removal from office by the Executive, without his giving sufficient reasons for such removals. He doubted the efficacy of the bill very much; and thought the Federal patronage ought to be diminished.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee obtained the floor, but yielded it to his colleague [Mr. WATTERSON] for explanation.

Mr. WATTERSON spoke for some time in reply to that portion of Mr. GENTRY's remarks which attacked his (Mr. W's) political career. By a reference to documents and newspapers, he triumphantly repelled those charges, and showed that the crime of political inconsistency was more applicable to certain other gentlemen, who were so famous for attributing it to their colleagues.

One charge against him was, that he had formerly supported Judge White as an Opposition candidate, whereas he was now in the Van Buren ranks. In relation to that, Mr. W. showed that when, with others in the Legislature of his State, he voted for the resolutions nominating Judge White, he did it on the ground that the Judge was considered as the ablest candidate to carry out the great principles of Jackson's administration. He also referred to the speeches of Mr. Bell and of Mr. Peyton, showing that in 1835 they took the same ground, and repudiated the idea that Judge White belonged to the Opposition. He most ably vindicated himself from the charges of his colleague, and showed conclusively that he was now maintaining the great principles of General Jackson's administration, which Mr. White was brought forward to carry out. His remarks will be published hereafter.

Mr. BANKS obtained the floor, but yielded it to Mr. BROWN, on the condition that he should speak to the present bill; as to discussion of matters and things in general, he was getting very tired of it.

Mr. BROWN promised; and then, after going at some length into a reply to remarks made by Mr. BELL some time ago, on the general grounds of the bill, he proceeded to a regular analysis of its provisions, commencing with the title, and so advancing in order. He had entered a short way into the subject, when he yielded the floor to

Mr. CHRISTOPHER H. WILLIAMS, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. TAYLOR demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 84, nays 62.

The House, at 6½ o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, May 20, 1840.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the joint Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution for the distribution of the Digest of Patents; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The report of the Committee on Claims, adverse to the claim of William and James Crook, was taken up for consideration:

[The history of the case, as given in the report of the committee, was briefly this: The claimants were owners of a vessel on Lake Ontario, which was seized by an officer of the United States for a supposed violation of the embargo laws. The vessel was sold, and the proceeds deposited with Theron Rudd, the clerk of the district court. A decree of restitution was afterwards obtained, and the proceeds were directed to be paid over to the owners of the vessel; but the clerk, in the meantime, had absconded with the funds. The claim was then made the subject of negotiation between our Government and that of Great Britain. It was met by the American Minister with the claim of the owners of the American ship Lydia, which was governed by the same principles, which the British Government having refused to adjust, the matter rested until 1834, when the British owners presented their claim to Congress. The committee reported adversely, on the ground that the question remains as an unadjusted subject of negotiation between the two Governments, and would give an undue advantage to the citizens of a foreign Government over those of our own.]

Mr. HUBBARD explained and advocated the adoption of the report, and Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, DAVIS, and KNIGHT opposed it: after some remarks by Mr. WRIGHT, the question was informally passed over.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy being taken up:

Mr. DIXON spoke at some length in favor of the original bill, and in opposition to the substitute proposed by Mr. WALL, and was followed by

Mr. NORVELL, who, in the course of his remarks, expressed his intention of voting in favor of including corporations within the provisions of the bill; but if this could not be carried, he would vote for the best bill that could be obtained, believing the passage of some measure of the kind imperatively called for.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 20, 1840.

As soon as the journal had been read,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the same by inserting in detail, the points of order raised on yesterday when Mr. GENTRY was addressing the House on the bill for securing the freedom of elections. Mr. P. thought such things ought to be made a matter of record. It could not be denied that of late the proceedings of the House had been such, as not only to degrade it as a body, but also to degrade the country.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not in order in saying any thing disrespectful to the House of Representatives.

Mr WADDY THOMPSON called the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order, and hoped he would not be permitted to proceed without making an apology for the disrespectful and insulting language he had used in relation to the House.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Pennsylvania had risen on a motion to amend the journal, which motion was in order.

Mr. THOMPSON said he had been under a misapprehension.

Mr. PETRIKIN Yes I am in order; I am always in order. He wished it to be distinctly understood, that he merely wished a correct statement of the facts as they occurred inserted on the journal. He wished nothing put there but what the officers of the House thought right. He thought all such proceedings of the House ought to be recorded, so that in case any member should be slandered or misrepresented to his constituents, there would be some record to refer to, by which the falsehood could be contradicted. He appealed to the House, if in relation to the transactions of yesterday, he had been fairly represented. No, he had not, and he wished to have the proceedings officially recorded, so that he might be able to vindicate himself from such misrepresentations.

After some desultory debate between Messrs. CUSHING, BRIGGS, GENTRY, and others,

The question on the motion to amend was taken, when it appeared there was no quorum.

Mr. McKAY moved a call of the House, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

Mr. McKAY, at the suggestion of several members, withdrew his motion for the call, and demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to amend.

Mr. MONROE moved to lay the motion to amend on the table.

On this motion, Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted as follows: yeas 58, nays 83.

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

And the question then recurring on the motion to amend,

The proposition to amend, was then read as follows, viz:

"The SPEAKER calls Mr. GENTRY to order for irrelevancy in debate.

"Mr. PETRIKIN objected to Mr. GENTRY's proceeding out of order.

"Leave, by unanimous consent, was then given to Mr. [GENTRY to proceed.

"Mr. PETRIKIN called Mr. GENTRY to order, and sent his objections, in writing, to the SPEAKER's table, as follows:

"The gentleman is not in order; what he is now stating, not being relevant to the bill under discussion. The opinions of members of this House, delivered in other places, not being authority here, nor the campaign previous to the election of Mr. Van Buren in 1836, has no bearing on the present subject now before the House.

"The SPEAKER did not entertain the point of order, as it did not state the nature of Mr. GENTRY's remarks objected to by Mr. PETRIKIN.

"Mr. GENTRY, by common consent, proceeded again.

"The SPEAKER called Mr. GENTRY to order.

"Mr. PETRIKIN objected to Mr. GENTRY's proceeding.

"Mr. WISE moved that Mr. GENTRY have leave to proceed, which was agreed to by the House."

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved the previous question on the motion to amend; which having been seconded, and the main question ordered, which was, "Shall the amendment be adopted?" it was was agreed to—yeas 80, nays 57.

The House resumed the consideration of the question pending on the 16th instant, when the hour for the reception of reports expired, that the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed; for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and for other purposes."

The immediate question pending when the subject was last up, was the motion of Mr. TAYLOR to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole of the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR withdrew that motion, and moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to strike out the amendment reported by that committee on Saturday last, and agreed to by the House.

Mr. T. made some remarks in favor of the motion; when

Mr. HUBBARD maintained that it was unnecessary to recommit the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR said the House had agreed to the amendments without proper consideration. The amendments took from the Secretary all discretion as to the propriety and inexpediency of consolidating the offices; and the effect would be to throw an additional expense on those who wished to purchase lands in the districts to which the law was intended to apply. The House having agreed to the amendments, no other alternative was left to have the error corrected, which it had fallen into by adopting the amendment, than by recommitting the bill to the committee indicated.

The queston was taken on motion to commit, and disagreed to by ayes 40, noes 92.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, it was carried in the affirmative; and the bill having been engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CRARY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House Senate bill entitled "An act supplemental to the act entitled an act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved June 22, 1838, with a recommendation of the committee that it do not pass.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Mississippi, rose to explain how it was, that the committee reported this bill, with the recommendation that it do not pass. For all practical purposes, this committee virtually numbers but eight members; other, and perhaps more important duties, always preventing the attendance of one of its members from its meetings. A deep interest was felt in this bill by the whole committee; and on every question affecting the principle, we stood four for, and four against it. Thus it was on a motion to report this bill without this recommendation, the vote stood, ayes 4, noes 4; and, the committee being equally divided, the motion was lost. A disposition was evinced by those opposed to the bill, to bury it in the committee, and to refuse this House an opportunity of expressing their views on this subject, and thus to withhold from a large class of worthy citizens, what justice and good policy imperiously demanded. In this condition of things, the friends of the bill were constrained, in order to get the bill out of the committee, and thus afford the House an opportunity to act on this subject, to agree to report the bill with the recommendation that it do not pass. He hoped the House would reject the recommendation of the committee, and pass the bill.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky moved to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved to commit it the Committee of the Whole, and make it the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART was in favor of immediate action on the bill, and opposed to committing it to either the Committee of the Whole, or the Committee on the state of the Union. The bill did not contain an appropriation, and whatever might have been the previous practice of the House, there was nothing found in the rules of the House which require the bill to be committed. He hoped it would not be committed. If it was, it would be tantamount to its rejection, because it would never be reached.

Mr. LINCOLN contended that the bill ought to be referred to a Committee of the Whole. He directed the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the journal of the House, where it would appear that a similar bill had, by a majority, been referred to a Committee of the Whole, and debated therein day after day. The rule of the House required that every bill involving an appropriation, should be considered in Committee of the Whole, and he would submit to gentlemen whether this bill was not one of that character. Did it not appropriate to the pre-emption settlers the whole difference between the amount of one dollar and a quarter per acre and the prices such lands would fetch in the market? Was not this appropriation of the public lands to pre-emption settlers a means of diminishing the revenue? Certainly it was; as, if the same lands were sold in the market, they would fetch ten times the price, and the Treasury would be benefited by the amount.

The very object of the bill was to grant lands to these settlers at a minor price to that for which they were sold to others. This was so plain that it scarcely needed illustration. But suppose, for instance, a man had made a settlement in the West, and the spot he had chosen should in a few months afterwards be selected as the foundation of a future city. In a few years, and perhaps in a few months, the land for which the settler was charged but a dollar and a quarter an acre, might sell for a hundred dollars an acre. Were not such instances numerous, when the land, owing to such circumstances, had advanced to an enormous price; and yet this bill proposed to appropriate the whole difference over and above a dollar and a quarter an acre to the pre-emption settler. Was it not, then, clearly an appropriation bill, coming under the rule of the House, which requires that "All proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in a committee of the whole House?"

Why, the very idea of an appropriation presupposed an action upon the revenue. Did not this right of pre-emption affect the revenue of the country? Did the Government not draw a great amount of money from the sales of the public lands? and if those lands were sold at a price much below their market value, would not that diminish the revenue from that source? If the lands were thus given up, then the bill was an appropriation of public lands for the benefit of the pre-emption settlers, and therefore came within the rule. He challenged gentlemen to show a single instance when a bill of this character had not been first considered in committee. Such was the proper and regular course—a course dictated, not only by reason, but by the rules and the invariable usage of the House, from the time of its legislative existence down to the present period.

Gentlemen spoke of questions of expediency; but, for his part, he had no idea of deviating from the old safe course. He had no idea of thus disposing of the public domain, and of leaving it to the chance of having all debate cut off by the previous question. This was a bill of great importance to every section of the country, and ought, therefore, to have a full and fair discussion in committee and in the House; and he, for one, would not consent to a deviation from the proper course. He repeated that a reference to a Committee of the Whole was demanded by the rules and former practice of the House; and that to dispose of it in any other way, would be manifest injustice.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama said that he hoped the House would not commit the bill. He felt confident that neither the rules nor the practice of the House required that it should be committed. The rule requires that all bills making appropriations of money shall be committed, and he was willing to admit that the rule also embraced appropriations of lands; but this bill proposes no appropriation whatever, either of land or money. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] says that the passage of this bill is urged on the ground that the lands are worth more than, under the provisions of the bill, the settlers are required to pay. Mr. C. said it was no time to debate the merits of the bill, nor did he design doing so at this time, but he denied, as one of its advocates, that ground for its support, and would take issue with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN,] on the fact that the public lands were sold to pre-emptors cheaper than to purchasers at auction. Mr. C. said if gentlemen would examine the history of the sale of the public lands, they would find that it sold for within a fraction as much under the several pre-emption laws as it had on an average at public auction, and that fraction above the Government price was less than the increased cost of the auction sales; so that in a financial view of the question, the policy was to allow pre-emptions to settlers. Mr. C. said, that so far from providing for an appropriation, if the bill were to pass, much more money would be brought into the Treasury than would be without it. He said that, instead of placing the merits of this measure on the ground stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the friends of the policy had always contended, that as the auction sales brought but little or no more than the Government price for the public lands, those who had made valuable improvements thereon at their own labor and expense, and thereby increased and facilitated the sale of other public lands, had, according to equity and common justice, a better right to buy from the Government at the same price than the speculators at the auction sales, who, by combinations, scarcely ever give more than $1 25 per acre.

Mr. C. said that he could not see the necessity for committing the bill. He had shown that it involved no appropriation, and thought it was equally clear that it proposed no new principle. It proposed to revive the pre-emption law of 1833 with some amendments, not, however, altering materially any principle then for the third or fourth time recognized by Congress. It had been discussed over and over again in both Houses of Congress and before the people, until every one was perfectly familiar with it. Mr. S. contended that it was perfectly clear to every member, that in the present state of the business of the session, the measure could not be acted on, if it were refused. Besides this bill, we have many other important measures before the House, of general and direct interest with a majority, which would always ride over this; that while he trusted the bill was favorably considered by a majority, yet it was merely local, and directly interesting to the new States only.

Mr. C. said that as he considered it would be fatal to the bill to commit it under the circumstances he had stated, he hoped no friend of the measure would vote for the motion. For his own part he would consider the vote about to be taken as a test vote as to its strength in the House, and hoped every member would so consider it in giving his vote—that it was not to prevent free and full discussion that he opposed commitment, for he did not fear any debate or examination into its merits, but to insure action at this session, which he knew would not be had if it went to the committee.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky said this was a mere question of reference, and the debate ought to be confined to the point. In the first place he contended that the bill ought to go to a Committee of the Whole, because such a course was in conformity to former usage of the House, as the history of every pre-emption bill would show. But if gentlemen meant to cast aside all former usage and precedent, and strike out into a new path; if they intended to lose sight of all former principles by which they had been governed, why it was high time that the country and that posterity should know it. If such was their course, it was time the people should know that the old elements of legislation had been broken up, and that a new light had burst fourth, and that nothing but novelty and change had come upon all.

The former usage, precedent, and practice of the House demanded that the bill should be referred to a Committee of the Whole. He did not wish gentlemen to rely on any statement of his to prove that this course had always been taken, but he would refer to the journal of the House, and callenge any one to produce a single instance, when a bill of this character had not taken that direction. He appealed to facts, and he was sure these facts would bear him out in what he had said. Was the old doctrine that the public lands were not the property of the General Government to be revived again?

He contended that this bill did contain an appropriation, and as such, ought to be referred to a Committee of the Whole, in conformity with the former usage of the House. The difference between the Government price, and the price the land might bring, when exposed to public sale, would be in effect an appropriation, and a loan to the person benefited by the pre-emption. If it were not so, why then the necessity of passing the bill at all. He could hardly have thought it possible that gentlemen should have asked the House to pursue such an unprecedented course in relation to this bill.

The gentleman from Alabama says this is an "old subject, well understood, and that there is no necessity for any discussion." He advances that as a reason why it should not be referred to a Committee of the Whole. But when the gentleman says it is an old bill, I ask him if he has read it. Has he examined the bill which he says there is no need of discussing? If he has, does he not see that the bill is based on three new grounds, and that it involves principles which swallow up the quintessence of all former bills? Does he not see that it opens the door wide, and invites every kind of abuse to walk in?

Mr. R. GARLAND said, in substance, that he was friendly to the passage of the bill, and always had been in favor of pre-emption acts; and dated his support of the measure farther back than those who were so anxious to override the rules of the House to come to action upon it. He contended that, by the rule, it should be committed. It was a proposition to dispose of the public lands, through the pre-emption right, at a much less rate than they might be sold for at public auction. It was a measure, therefore, which, to that extent, affected the revenue. He was not, however, friendly to the bill in favor of doing away with the former practices of the House on similar bills.

Mr. WELLER said he did not believe that the merits of a bill should be discussed on a question of reference; and for the purpose of bringing the House to a vote, he moved the previous question.

Mr. CASEY inquired of the CHAIR what would be the operation of the previous question; whether it would bring the House to a vote on the motion to commit the bill, or on ordering it to be engrossed.

The CHAIR said that would entirely depend on the questiou whether the bill contained an appropriation, and whether it required by the rule to be committed. He said he had been informed by the Chief Clerk, that although it had been customary to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in one instance the House had decided otherwise, and the Clerk was now looking for the precedent; but if the bill was one which ought not to go to a Committee of the Whole, the previous question would be on the engrossment. If he was now called upon to decide, he must decide that the previous question, if sustained, would bring the House to a vote on the motion to commit.

Mr. CASEY said if the SPEAKER so decided that this bill must go to Committee of the Whole, under the rule, he should deem it his duty to take an appeal. He was aware that a former Speaker had decided that a bill making an appropriation of land must be so referred, but this bill made no such appropriation. He hoped the SPEAKER would look to former decisions on this subject.

The SPEAKER had hoped some gentleman would appeal. The point had been referred to him as a question of order, and his decision was that if the bill proposed to give to settlers all over the price of one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, then it must be an appropriation bill; but if it proposed only to sell the lands for what they would fetch, it was not an appropriation bill.

The question being on the appeal,

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CASEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. JAMES GARLAND moved a call of the House; and, on that motion,

Mr. WISE demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 60, nays 113.

So a call was refused.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the morning hour having expired, the House then passed to the orders of the day.

Senate bills on the Speaker's table were then taken up, read twice, and appropriately committed.

The SPEAKER announced that the business next in order was the bill to secure the freedom of elections, and to provide for the faithful administration of the Executive patronage.

The question being, "Shall the bill be rejected?"

Mr. BROWN, who was entitled to the floor, analyzed the various provisions of the bill, and argued that it was the same in spirit as the bill introduced into the other end of the Capitol, by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDE,] and which was rejected by that body, there being but 8 votes in favor of its passage. And the same spirit, he said, ran through that bill and the bill, now before the House, as ran through the old sedition law. The bill while it professed to be in favor of full liberty, its object in fact was slavery in its most odious form. He appealed to his colleague [Mr. BELL] whether he was willing to advance the most worthy and most prominent of his fellow-citizens to a position where they would be disfranchised—where they dared not as freemen speak out and act out their principles. He asked, was that freedom which thus tied up a portion of his fellow citizens? Mr. B. said he would strenuously oppose this bill if it disfranchised one of the citizens of his State, as if it proposed to disfranchise the whole.

Mr. B. showed the effect the bill would have had, if it had become a law when heretofore introduced. He said it would have cut right and left amongst the political friends of his colleague, (Mr. BELL;) in proof of which, he adverted to the fact, that a majority of the Federal officers in Tennessee belonged to the Whig party; out of the postmasters in the five county towns in his district, three were furiously and actively opposed to Mr. Van Buren. Instead of the passage of the bill being an injury to the present Administration, he believed it would have been a benefit. Mr. B. adverted to the first gag bill brought before Congress, which was introduced in 1791 by way of amendment to the first excise, or custom house bill. He examined the provisions and principles of that, and compared with the provisions and principles of the bill before the House, and argued that the latter, in both particulars, was more odious than the former. That measure was rejected in that early day of the Republic by a vote of 21 to 37. Mr. Madison and Mr. Giles both voting against it. He further showed the identy of this bill, both in principle, and its provisions, with the old sedition law. The hour of half past two having arrived, the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. BROWN resumed his remarks, and, in the course of his speech, referred to the political course of Mr. BELL, more particularly on the subject of Abolition. He showed, by a reference to the records, that previous to the Harrisburg nomination, that gentleman was ultra in his opposition to Abolition petitions; but that subsequently he had changed his course, and gone so far as to recommend a reference of such petitions to a committee, with instructions to report thereon.

Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania obtained the floor. He said he did not wish to make a speech, but to save the time of the House, and the money of the nation; and moved the previous question; which was seconded, and,

On the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were, yeas 92, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Burke, W. O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Craig, Dana, John Davis, John W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—53.

So the main question was ordered.

The question being now on the rejection of the bill, and the yeas and nays having been asked, were ordered, and were, yeas 108, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cushing, Dana, John Davis, John W. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Chinn, James Cooper, Cranston, Davies, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Gentry, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Hiland Hall, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Hiram P. Hunt, Kempshall, Lincoln, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Osborne, Palen, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Taliaferro, Toland, Triplett, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—53.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. ATHERTON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANLY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, but Mr. S. withdrew his motion.

The motion of Mr. ATHERTON was agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BANKS in the chair.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to take up the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. WISE moved to take up the Naval appropriation bill.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. ATHERTON.

On motion of Mr. STANLY, the question was taken by tellers, (Messrs. UNDERWOOD and RAMSEY acting as such) and resulted, ayes 101, nays 64.

Mr. CUSHING moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; but, before proceeding with his remarks, he wished to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. ATHERTON,) under whose immediate custody the bill appeared to be, he having made every motion for taking it up. This bill was a very important measure—indeed, it was the measure of the Administration; and yet it had come before the House from the Committee of Ways and Means, without any report or exposition of their views, to show why this projet of law should be adopted. And if the gentleman from New Hampshire desired to make any explanations or expositions, he (Mr. C.) was very ready to yield the floor, to give him that opportunity. Nay, he was not only ready to yield the floor, but he proffered it to him, and invited an exposition of the bill.

Mr. ATHERTON said he duly appreciated the courtesy of the gentleman from Massachusetts in thus politely offering to yield the floor. All he had to say, however, was, that this was not a new measure, either to members of the House or to the country. It had been several times recommended by the President in his annual message, and there had been two reports in each branch of Congress on the general merits of the bill. Not only so, but he would refer to remarks made by a gentleman of the Opposition the other day, "that every member of this House was sent here by his constituents, either for or against this bill." The majority of the committee, (and he believed a majority of the House,) had now determined to take up the bill, when the gentleman from Massachusetts had moved to strike out the enacting clause, to defeat it, without giving any opportunity to debate the sections in detail as they came up.

That being the case, he could only say that it was the duty of the gentleman to give to the House and to the country his reason why he had made the motion.

Mr. CUSHING was about to resume his remarks against the bill; when

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the committee rise; which motion was agreed to.

The committee then rose, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, May 21, 1840.

Mr. STURGEON presented two memorials from citizens of Philadelphia, praying the remodification of the tariff on the basis of that of 1824; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Alley, Staunton, and Co. merchants of New York, praying a remission of the duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire while in the custody of the collector of that port; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred

The petition of William Ferguson;

The petition of Elizabeth Garrabrants;

The petition of the widow of Samuel Walker;

The petition of Jacob Hall; made adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. P. also asked that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of E. Shaler, and the memorial of Conrad Walts; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Thomas Farrar; which was agreed to.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Edward Criddle; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to regulate enlistments into the army and navy; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to appoint a board consisting of navy and marine officers, to witness an exhibition of Nighill Nutting's patent cylinder fire arms, and report the results in detail for the information of Congress, together with their opinion of the advantages to be derived from the adoption of the same into the naval service.

Mr. STRANGE gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill making certain appropriations for the Patent Office.

Mr. WILLIAMS gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill in addition to an act regulating the pay of the navy.

The bill for the relief of Avery, Saltmarsh, and Company, was taken up on its third reading, and its passage was advocated by Messrs. ROBINSON, LUMPKIN, and PRENTISS, and opposed by Messrs. WHITE, HUBBARD, CALHOUN, and DAVIS, and was then laid on the table for the present.

The report of the Committee on Claims adverse to the petition of William and James Crook, was then taken up, and was discussed at much length—Messrs. WRIGHT, HUBBARD, WALKER, and CALHOUN sustaining the report of the committee, and Messrs. CLAY of Ky. KNIGHT, HENDERSON, and WEBSTER, advocating the claim of the petitioners; when,

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the further consideration of the whole subject was indefinitely postponed—ayes 25, noes 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—14.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy being taken up, after some remarks by Messrs. HUBBARD, CLAYTON, LUMPKIN, CLAY of Kentucky, WALKER, WEBSTER, and TALLMADGE,

On motion by Mr. TALLMADGE, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, May 21, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the Senate bill reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands, entitled "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'an act granting pre-emption rights to the settlers on the public lands,'" approved June 22, 1838. The motions pending on said bill were those of Mr. WHITE of Kentucky, to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS to commit it to the Committee of the Whole, and make it the order for to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and was proceeded in until 136 members had answered to their names. The list of absentees were called over, when the following gentlemen were excused by the House on account of absence from the city, and indisposition, viz. Messrs. ADAMS, ANDERSON of Kentucky, BOTTS, BOYD, BREWSTER, MCCARTY, FILLMORE, GRANGER, JONES of Virginia, LAWRENCE, MEDILL, TAYLOR, PECK, PICKENS, RODGERS, WILLIAMS of Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved that the following gentlemen, acting on the Committee on the Militia, now in session, be excused, viz. Messrs. KEIM, GOODE, RODGERS of New York, RIDGEWAY, GRIFFIN, WAGONER; which motion was disagreed to.

The call of the list of absentees having been completed, and 163 members having answered to their names,

On motion of Mr. WELLER, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with—ayes 92, noes 40.

The question immediately pending when the bill was up on yesterday, was the motion of Mr. HOPKINS to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on said motion, were taken, and were—yeas 53, nays 122, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, J. W. Allen, Banks, Bond, Briggs, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, Connor, James Cooper, Cranston, Edward Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Goggin, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Wm. S. Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Mitchell, Monroe, Montgomery, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Randolph, Rayner, Russell, Samuels, Shepard, Slade, Stanly, Storrs, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Warren, John White, and Lewis Williams—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Black, Blackwell, Burke, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, John Davis, J. W. Davis, G. Davis, Dickerson, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Gentry, Gerry, Goode, Green, Hall, Hammond, Hand, J. Hastings, Henry, Holmes, Hook, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Chas. Johnston, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Miller, Montanya, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Proffit, Ramsey, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Sergeant, Shaw, Simonton, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney-Underwood, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Weller, Edward D. White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—122.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

The question then recurring on the appeal taken by Mr. CASEY on yesterday from the decision of the CHAIR, that the bill required commitment,

The SPEAKER said the question was on the appeal from his decision on yesterday, that the bill ought to go to a Committee of the Whole. On yesterday he had made that decision according to his own construction of the rule, as he believed it was in accordance with the previous practice of the House. But since then he had discovered that in 1834, a pre-emption bill had passed through the House without being committed to a Committee of the Whole. That being the case, he would reverse his decision of yesterday, so that the previous question instead of being on the commitment, would be on ordering the engrossment of the bill for a third reading.

Mr. LINCOLN understood the SPEAKER to decide then, that according to the former practice of the House, the previous question would apply to the engrossment.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. LINCOLN said he considered it his duty to take an appeal from that decision, and wished to say a few words in support thereof, but the previous question having been ordered, the CHAIR informed him that no debate could be entertained.

After a desultory conversation between Messrs. BRIGGS, LINCOLN, CASEY, DROMGOOLE, UNDERWOOD, and others,

The question being on the appeal, the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. JAMESON asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

And the main question, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the sament of the House?" was decided as follows: yeas 100, nays 91.

YEAS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, John Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Davee, Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gerry, Goode, Hammand, Hand, John Hastings, Henry, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McCulloh, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, Simonton, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Weller, Wick, J. W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Andrews, Banks, Baker-Barnard, Beirne, Bell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Coles-Connor, James Cooper, Cranston, Curtis, Garret Davis, Daw, son, Deberry, Dennis, Dromgoole, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Rice Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hoffman, Hook, Hopkins, James, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, McKay, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Montgomery, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Peck, Ramsey, Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Reed, Rives, Russell, Samuels, Sergeant, Shepard, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagener, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, and Lewis Williams—91.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired of the CHAIR whether it would be in order to move the recommitment of the bill.

The CHAIR replied that the previous question having been ordered, it would not.

Here the action on the bill was arrested, the morning hour to which it was confined having expired, and the House passed to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 28th January, 1839, a supplemental report, showing the amount of compensation which has been received, whether by fees or otherwise, by the district clerks, attorneys, and marshals, during the year 1839.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Ordnance Department, setting forth the causes which have prevented an answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives, of 11th February, 1840, in relation to the prices at which muskets, rifles, and pistols, might be made, and delivered to the United States, &c.

On motion of Mr. MCKAY, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Senate bill, entitled an act to extend for a longer period, the several acts now in force for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States, having been returned from the Senate with amendments,

Mr. SARGEANT said the amendments were merely corrections of errors, and quite consistent with the amendments of the House to that bill, and therefore moved that the House concur in said amendments; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the House then resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. CUSHING being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday. After alluding to the importance of the measure as emanating from the Executive, and its previous rejection at former Congresses, he expressed his disapprobation at the course now pursued by the Administration in again urging it. He intimated that, since its last rejection, the people had been listening to the voice of the tempter, and were now thought more favorable to its adoption. But he called upon the people to arise in their might, and cast aside the snare, lest, when it was too late, they would find themselves like another Sampson, bound hand and foot, and delivered over to the Philistines. He complained that this great measure came up without any affirmative defence from the Administration. He said it appeared that this course of proceeding was equivalent to saying that the Executive found himself strong enough to pass it, and therefore did not deem it proper to make any affirmative defence. He contended that this was not an untried experiment. The fact was the experiment had been tried by the Executive, and it had failed, and the House was called upon to sanction and make into a law that which had been tried and failed. He contended that this was but a sequel to the great State bank experiment of General Jackson, which had failed, and had involved the country in disgrace and ruin. That great failure had taken place when the present Executive came into power, and this Sub-Treasury scheme was adopted in its stead.

He complained that all the great appropriation bills had been thrust aside for the purpose of bringing up this bill. He alluded to the paramount importance of the appropriation bills which importance was implied by their precedence in the rules. He saw no necessity or reason why this bill should be taken up before other bills of far greater importance. He saw, however, one reason which perhaps had induced the Administration party to take it up, and that was the taunts which had been thrown out by the Opposition, that the bill would not be brought up. If that was the reason, then the bill was brought up merely to show the courage of the Administration party in the House, and not for the public good. He hoped, therefore, that the urgency o the appropriation bills would not be adduced as an argument for stifling debate on this bill. Mr. C. then proceeded to examine the principles of the bill, which, he said, contained two propositions, viz. for an Independent Treasury, and independent currency. In discussing the question of relative patronage between the State bank deposite system and this bill, Mr. C. admitted that it conferred less patronage than the former.

The House, at half past two o'clock, took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. CUSHING continued to address the House until a quarter to seven o'clock, when he gave way for a motion that the committee rise. The motion prevailed—ayes 60, noes 53.

The committee accordingly rose, when a motion was made by several gentlemen simultaneously for adjournment. The yeas and nays were demanded on this motion, and resulted as follows: yeas 69, nays 72.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts moved a call of the House, but the motion was apparently negatived, when the yeas and nays were demanded, but before they were taken—

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania moved an adjournment; the yeas and nays were demanded, and being again taken, resulted as follows: yeas 69, nays 58.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, May 22, 1840.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial of citizens of Georgetown, praying the recharter of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, and remonstrating against the passage of any act requiring the banks of the District to resume specie payments until a resumption by the banks of the State of Virginia and Maryland; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The bill concerning a seminary of learning in the Territory of Iowa, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for satisfying outstanding military bounty land warrants, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill giving the assent of Congress to the acts of Virginia, incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, and for other purposes, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, and was advocated by Messrs. ROANE, KING, WALKER, and MERRICK, and opposed by Messrs. TAPPAN and HUBBARD, and on motion of the latter, its further consideration was postponed until to-morrow.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and the question was on Mr. WALL's substitute for the bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the substitute, and in favor of the bill; and its further consideration was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. PRESTON offered a resolution that hereafter the hour of meeting for the Senate should be 12 o'clock; which, after some remarks by Messrs. LUMPKIN and SEVIER, in opposition, and Mr. PRESTON, in support, was ayes 18, noes 19.

The Senate then adjourned to Monday next.

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Henderson, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvel, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Spence, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—18.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 22, 1840.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer a resolution proposing to make the Independent Treasury bill the special order of the day from this day at 12 o'clock, and every succeeding day at that hour, until the said bill shall be disposed of.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered—were yeas 61, nays 78.

So the House refused to have a call.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 86, nays 88:

YEAS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, William R. So the House refused to suspend the rules.

PRE-EMPTION BILL.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands."

The question pending when the morning hour expired on yesterday, was on seconding the call for the previous question; which, if sustained, would bring the House to a vote on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland moved that the bill do lie upon the table.

On that motion Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TURNEY inquired of the CHAIR, if the bill be laid upon the table, whether a majority could at any time take it up.

The CHAIR said that, according to the practice of the past session, it required two-thirds to take it up again. He was understood to say that, when in its order, it would require but a majority to take it up; but that it was not competent at any other time to take it up, except by a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. LINCOLN inquired if it would be in order to amend the bill.

The CHAIR replied, that if the previous question be not sustained, it would be in order to amend the bill.

Mr. STEWART of Illinois inquired of the CHAIR if it was in order again to make the motion to lay the bill on the table, the House having decided that question on yesterday.

The CHAIR said it was in order, action having been had on the bill since that question was decided on yesterday.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the motion to lay the bill on the table, were—yeas 65, nays 104.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Briggs, Sampson H. Butler, Clark, Coles, Connor, James Cooper, Cranston, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dromgoole, Edwards, Everett, Fisher, James Garland, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hopkins, James, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Mason, Monroe, Montgomery, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Randolph, Reed, Russell, Samuels, Sergeant, Shepard, Slade, Stanly, Storrs, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Warren, John White, and Lewis Williams—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Boyd, Brockway, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Dickerson, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Rice Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Henry, Hillen, Holleman, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Malloiy, Marchand, Marvin, Medill, Miller, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Ramsey, Rariden, Rhett, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, Simonton, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—104.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The question then recurring on seconding the previous question, it was determined in the negative, on count—ayes 77, noes 82.

[If the previous question had been seconded, the next question would have been on the engrossment of the bill.]

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. WHITE of Kentucky to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CASEY said he looked upon the commitment of the bill as decisive of its fate. If the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at this late period of the session, it will not be reached this session, and every gentleman who will vote upon this question is aware of that fact. He therefore called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. RANDOLPH inquired of the CHAIR, if the motion to recommit did not prevail, whether the bill would not stand on the SPEAKER's table, and ride over all the appropriation bills.

The CHAIR said it would not take precedence of the appropriation bills, but would be the first thing in order during the morning hour only, and would stand on the calendar as one of the bills on the SPEAKER's table for engrossment.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the motion to recommit, were—yeas 91, nays 100.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Beirne, Bell, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, Clark, Connor, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Curtis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dromgoole, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fisher, James Garland, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of Va. Hill of North Carolina, Holmes Hook, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, Lucas, McKay, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Montgomery, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Peck, Ramsey, Randolph, Reed, Rives, Russell, Samuels, Sergeant, Shepard, Simonton, Slade, John Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Sumter, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Wise—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Black, Boyd, A. V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Rice Garland, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Henry, Hillen, Holleman, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kilie, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard. Lewis, Lowell, McClellan, McCulloh, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard. Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Rariden, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, E. Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, A. Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—100.

So the House refused to commit the bill.

[If the motion to commit had prevailed, it would have been tantamount to the rejection of the bill, inasmuch as the condition of the business on the calendar would have prevented the House from reaching it, or having any action on it, this session. It is, therefore, properly to be inferred that all those who were opposed to the passage of the bill, voted for its commitment.]

The question now recurred on the motion to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, to take its place on the calendar.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS, who made that motion, withdrew it.

The SPEAKER said the bill would now go over, and would be first in order on Tuesday next.

Mr. LINCOLN offered an amendment to the bill in substance, so as to make it conform to the act of 1838.

Mr. GOODE offered the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That all persons being the head of a family who have settled and made improvements on any part of the United States alternate sections reserved from sale on the Wabash and Erie canal or the Miami canal, in the State of Ohio, prior to the last day of November, 1835, be permitted to enter not more than eighty acres of land on which they have so as aforesaid settled and improved at the proper land office, by way of pre-emption, at $2 50 per acre.

These amendments were received and subsequently ordered, with the bill, to be printed.

Mr. COST JOHNSON wished to have a distinct understanding on the disposal of this bill.

The SPEAKER repeated that it was now laid over until Tuesday, on which day it would be first in order; the question being on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON said, as that was the case, he would ask leave to offer the following resolution, which was read for information, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish a statement of the cost of building, equipping, and repairing, the public vessels of the United States, from the first day of January, 1830, to the present time, the cost of each vessel under the above mentioned several heads to be distinctly and separately set forth, and the time designated when the same was built, equipped, or repaired.

Objection being made,

Mr. JOHNSON moved a suspension of the rules, which motion was rejected. So the resolution was not received.

Mr. REED, on leave, presented sundry memorials, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the House proceeded to the orders of the day, and resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BRIGGS in the chair, on the private bills on the calendar.

The bill under consideration, when the committee last rose, was a bill for the relief of Benjamin Adams and others.

Mr. PETRIKIN had moved to strike out the enacting clause. In supporting that motion he used the following language, for which was decided out of order by the CHAIR as irrelavant, viz:

"Mr. PETRIKIN was proceeding to quote in a general way what had formerly been said on the floor of the House, relative to the waste and extravagance of the Democratic party, and the present Administration, and that when the Whigs were told they had voted for the bills granting the sums complained of as extravagant, they replied that the Democrats had the majority, and ought to have prevented the passage of all improper laws. 'Pass these bills,' said he, 'voting away millions of money, and we will be again told the Democracy had the majority in the House of Representatives, why did they pass such bills?'

"Mr. PETRIKIN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and on a division by tellers on sustaining the decision, it was discovered there was no quorum. Whereupon the committe rose, and the House adjourned."

The question now pending being on the appeal,

The CHAIR restated in substance the reasons for which he had called the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order. He did not consider the remarks of the gentleman in relation to charges of extravagance, etc. as at all pertinent to the subject then before the committee, which was a private bill. If the gentleman had been suffered to go on, then those who might consider themselves implicated by the charges, would claim a right to reply; and thus a debate would arise on a subject different to that before them, and the discussion would be on the prodigality of the Administration, instead of the present bill.

Some conversation of a desultory character ensued, in which Mr. PETRIKIN, in answer to a question, said he had mentioned no gentleman's name in his remarks, but had merely referred, in a general way, to what had been said, etc.

The question "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand?" was then taken by tellers, and resulted—ayes 34, noes 80—no quorum voting.

Some conversation ensuing, to the effect that there was evidently a quorum in the hall,

The CHAIR said he was willing to consider his decision as reversed.

So Mr. PETRIKIN was in order.

The bill, by general consent, was then laid aside for future action.

The committee then acted on several other bills until the hour arrived for taking the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The bills reported from the Committee of the Whole in the morning session, were respectively disposed of as indicated below.

The bill for the relief of the assignees of Low, Taylor and Co. was postponed till Friday next.

The following bills from the Senate having been engrossed, were read the third time and passed:

A bill granting a pension to Chauncy Rice.

House bill to refund a fine imposed on Matthew Lyon, under the sedition law, to his heirs and legal representatives, having been reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment;

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL its further consideration was postponed till Friday next.

Mr. REYNOLDS subsequently moved to reconsider the vote on the postponement, and some discussion arose on the motion: the further consideration of the subject lies over under the rule.

The following bills were reported from the Committee without amendment, and having been ordered to be engrossed, were postponed for further consideration till to-morrow, viz:

A bill for the relief of Joseph Wallace and the heirs and representatives of Robert Leckie and Jeremiah D. Hayden, deceased;

A bill for the relief of Benjamin Fry; and

A bill for the relief of Gen. Danl. Parker.

The bill for the relief of Alexander Everett, which was amended in Committee of the Whole on the motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, was taken up in the House, and the said amendment having been concurred in, and the bill, according to order, having been engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Hyacinth Lassell, which was amended in the Committee of the Whole on the motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, so as to restrict the grant of land to such as was subject to private entry, was taken up in the House, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. CUSHING, who voted to concur in the amendment of the committee, moved to reconsider that vote; which motion

Mr. WICK was proceeding to support in some remarks; consequently the bill, under the rule, was laid over for future consideration.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, the House again went into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair;) and the committee having considered many bills, and passed others,

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, the committee rose and reported the following to the House, without amendment: [For which see next column.]

Mr. TURNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to second the call for the previous question on the pre-emption bill during the morning session.

The CHAIR suggested that such a motion would not be in order.

Mr. CASEY argued that, before such a motion could possibly be in order, the House would first have to reconsider to vote subsequently taken refusing to commit the bill; and

After a few remarks by Messrs. R. GARLAND, TURNEY, CASEY, and BRIGGS,

The SPEAKER said, the gentleman could accomplish his motion, if it was his wish to take the bill out of its present position before the House, and to delay action upon it, to move to reconsider the motion refusing to commit the bill, and then move to postpone the bill to some future time.

Mr. TURNEY then made a motion to reconsider the vote refusing to commit the bill; which was entered.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS,

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, May 23, 1840.

After the reading of the Journal,

The SPEAKER suggested to the House the propriety of dispensing with the business of the morning hour, for the purpose of disposing of all the business on the SPEAKER's table. It would prevent much inconvenience to the SPEAKER; to which suggestion the House assented.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked the House to excuse him from further service on the Committee of Privileges, growing out of the difficulty between Messrs. R. GARLAND and BYNUM; which request the House, however, refused.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, by general consent, reported back to the House Senate bill in relation to the statue of Washington, by Greenough, with an amendment, substituting the words "Secretary of the Navy" for the words "Committee on the Library;" which amendment was concurred in, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER announced that the next business in order was the motion of Mr. CUSHING to reconsider the vote on yesterday, by which the House concurred in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, to the bill for the relief of Hyacinth Lassell, and subjecting the grant of land in said bill to be located on such of the public land as was subject to private entry.

Mr. WICK went into a history of the claim, and advocated the motion for reconsideration.

Mr. PETRIKIN was opposed to the motion to reconsider, and spoke in support of his amendment, which was adopted by the Committee of the Whole. He doubted whether the claimant should have any land at all, instead of granting him a float to locate the best lands in small parcels at different points.

Mr. WICK had no objection to confine the float so as to have all the land located in one body.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider, and disagreed to.

The bill now stands on its engrossment.

The next before the House was the motion to reconsider the vote postponing till Friday next the bill to refund a fine imposed on the late Matthew Lyon, under the sedition law, to his heirs and legal representatives.

Messrs. RUSSELL and L. WILLIAMS hoped the motion to reconsider would not prevail.

Mr. TURNEY advocated the reconsideration, and moved the previous question, which was seconded; and the main question having been ordered, was taken, and resulted—ayes 79, noes 46.

The vote having been reconsidered, the question again recurred on the motion to postpone the bill to Friday next, which was disagreed to; and the bill now stands on the calendar on its engrossment.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer a resolution in relation to gag bills, and in relation to Executive patronage and Federal officers, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. R. GARLAND hoped he would not press such a resolution at that time, inasmuch as it would excite discussion, and embarrass the action on the private bills.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky persisted in his motion.

Mr. RAMSEY moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table, and agreed to.

PRE-EMPTION BILL.

The question next in order was the motion of Mr. TURNEY to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, granting pre-emption rights to settler on the public lands.

Mr. TURNEY moved to postpone the consideration of the above motion to reconsider until after the Sub-Treasury bill was disposed of.

Mr. CASEY said the object of the motion thus to postpone must be to defeat the bill. He wanted to know who were thus indirectly in favor of destroying the bill, and therefore called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 17, nays 140.

YEAS—Messrs. Banks, Beirne, Bynum, Connor, Dawson, Dennis, James Garland, Goggin, Hall, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hunt, McKay, Mason, Montgomery, Nisbet, Ramsey, Russell, Samuels, Steenrod, Turney, and Wise—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Beatty, Bell, Black, Bond, Boyd, Briggs, Brockway, Albert G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, W. O. Butler, Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clark, Clifford, James Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Eastman, Edwards, Ely, Everett, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Rice Garland, Gerry, Goode, Graham, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hammond, Hand, W. S. Hastings, John Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hillen, Hoffman, Hook, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kempshall, Kille, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lewis, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McCulloh, Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Miller, Mitchell, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Ogle, Osborne, Parrish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Storrs, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taliaferro, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Vroom, D. D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—140.

So the House refused to postpone.

Mr. CHAPMAN demanded the previous question on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to commit; which was seconded, and the main question having been ordered; which main question was, "Shall the vote be reconsidered?"

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 59, nays 97.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Beirne, Bell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Calhoun, Coles, Connor, James Cooper, Cranston, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dromgoole, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Grinnell, Hall, William S. The bill for the relief of Mary Tucker came up in its order, and,

On motion of Mr. R. GARLAND, its further consideration was postponed till Friday next.

The bill to refund a fine imposed on the late Matthew Lyon, under the sedition law, to his heirs and legal representatives, came up on its engrossment; when

Mr. RUSSELL moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "legal heirs," and inserting "personal representatives."

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked if this was not a bill to refund a fine paid in 1799, and if the petition of the person who paid it had not, in his lifetime, been repeatedly before Congress, and rejected; if it had not, in the course of forty years, undergone repeated discussions in both Houses without success? If so, he would move to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. TURNEY asked Mr. T. to withdraw his motion, and before he sat down, he would move the previous question.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said, if any explanation was desired, he would withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. TURNEY then asked for the reading of the report, which was read; after which, he moved the previous question.

The following report was made on the subject of the claim by Mr. TURNEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee adopted the report made by the same committee in 1832; which was read to the House, as will be found below. [That the country may understand the merits of the case, and may trace a history of the circumstances under which the fine was imposed upon Matthew Lyon; and that the history of those times, and the parties of those days may not be forgotten, the Reporter inserts the report at large.]

The Committee on the Judiciary to whom was referred the petition of Chittenden Lyon and Matthew Lyon, heirs and representatives of the late Matthew Lyon, deceased, report:

That in the month of October, 1798, the late Matthew Lyon, the father of the petitioners, at the circuit court held at Rutland, in the State of Vermont, was indicted and found guilty of having printed and published what was alleged to be a libel against Mr. John Adams, the then President of the United States. The alleged libel was in the following words, to wit: "As to the Executive, when I shall see the effects of that power bent on the promotion of the comfort, the happiness, and accommodation of the people, that Executive shall have my zealous and uniform support. But whenever I shall, on the part of our Executive, see every consideration of public welfare swallowed up in a continual grasp for power, in an unbounded thirst for ridiculous pomp, foolish adulation, and selfish avarice—when I shall behold men of real merit daily turned out office for no other cause than independency of sentiment—when I shall see men of firmness, merit, years, abilities, and experience, discarded in their applications for office, for fear they possess that independence, and men of meanness preferred for the ease with which they can take up and advocate opinions, the consequence of which they know but little of—when I shall see the sacred name of religion employed as a State engine to make mankind hate and persecute each other, I shall not be their humble advocate!" The second count in the indictment, on which the said Matthew Lyon was convicted, charged him with printing and publishing a seditious writing or libel, entitled "Copy of a letter from an American diplomatic character in France (Mr. Joel Barlow) to a member of Congress in Philadelphia," which was in the following words, to wit: "The misunderstanding between the two Governments has become extremely alarming; confidence is completely destroyed; mistrusts, jealousies, and a disposition to a wrong attribution of motives, are so apparent as to require the utmost caution in every word and action that are to come from your Executive—I mean if your object is to avoid hostilities. Had this truth been understood with you before the recall of Monroe—before the coming and second coming of Pinckney; had it guided the pens that wrote the bullying speech of your President, and stupid answer of your Senate, at the opening of Congress in November last, I should probably have had no occasion to address you this letter. But when we found him borrowing the language of Edmund Burke, and telling the world that, although he should succeed in treating with the French, there was no dependence to be placed in any of their engagements; that their religion and morality were at an end, and they had turned pirates and plunderers, and that it would be necessary to be perpetually armed against them, though you are at peace; we wondered that the answer of both Houses had not been an order to send him to the mad-house. Instead of this, the Senate have echoed the speech with more servility than ever George the Third experienced from either House of Parliament."

The court deemed both the publications above recited libellous, under the second section of the act commonly called the sedition law, passed the 4th July, 1798; which section is as follows, viz: "And be it further enacted, That if any person shall write, print, utter, or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered, or published, or shall knowingly and wilfully assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering, or publishing, any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of the Congress of the United States, or of the President of the United States, with an intent to defame the said Government, or either House of the said Congress, or the President, or to bring them, or either of them, into contempt or disrespect, or to excite against them, or either or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States, &c. then such person, being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years."

Upon this indictment Matthew Lyon was convicted, and sentenced by the court to be imprisoned for four months; to pay a fine of one thousand dollars, and the costs of the prosecution, taxed at sixty dollars and ninety-six cents; and to stand committed until the fine and costs were paid: which were paid, as appears by the exemplification of the record of the said trial and proceedings, now in the archives of this House.

The committee are of opinion that the law above recited was unconstitutional, null, and void, passed under a mistaken exercise of undelegated power, and that the mistake ought to be corrected by returning the fine so obtained, with interest thereon, to the legal representatives of Matthew Lyon.

The committee do not deem it necessary to discuss at length the character of that law, or to assign all the reasons, however demonstrative, that have induced the conviction of its unconstitutionality. No question connected with the liberty of the press ever excited a more universal and intense interest—ever received so acute, able, long-continued, and elaborate investigation—was ever more generally understood, or so conclusively settled by the concurring opinions of all parties, after the heated political contests of the day had passed away. All that now remains to be done by the Representatives of the people who condemned this act of their agents as unauthorized, and transcending their grant of power, to place beyond question, doubt, or cavil, that mandate of the Constitution prohibiting Congress from abridging the liberty of the press, and to discharge an honest, just, moral, and honorable obligation, is to refund from the Treasury the fine thus illegally and wrongfully obtained from one of their citizens: for which purpose the committee here with report a bill.

Mr. TILLINGHAST again adverted to the length of time which had elapsed since the claim was first presented. A whole generation had passed away since the claim was alleged to have originated, and it was now impossible to ascertain the true state of the facts, with any thing like satisfaction. He therefore insisted on his motion to lay on the table.

On this motion, Mr. HAND demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. TILLINGHAST withdrew his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. TURNEY moved the previous question on the bill, which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, on which Mr. T. demanded the yeas and nays.

And the question being first on the amendment,

Mr. TILLINGHAST renewed his motion to lay on the table.

On this motion, Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Briggs, Cranston, Davies, Evans, Giddings, Grinnell, Hall, Hawes, Hunt, Lincoln, Russell, Storrs, Tillinghast, Trumbull, and Lewis Williams—17.

NAYS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Beatty, Bell, Bond, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, William B. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—129.

So the House refused to lay on the table.

And the question then recurred on the first part of the main question—being on the amendment to strike out the words "legal heirs," and insert the words "personal representatives."

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 44, nays 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Bell, Bond, Brockway, S. H. Butler, Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, Carter, Clark, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Edward Davies, Evans, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goggin, Green, Hall, John Hill of Virginia, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, McKay, Mason, Ogle, Osborne, Randolph, Ridgway, Russell, Samuels, Simonton, Slade, Storrs, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Toland, Triplett, Underwood, Warren, Edward D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wisk, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—94.

The question then being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for its third reading, it was taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Samoson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, W. B. Cooper, Crabb, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Dickerson, Dellett, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gerry, Goggin, Goode, Green, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Holleman, Holmes, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, James, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, Kempshall, Kille, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, McClellan, McCulloch, Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Miller, Montanya, S. NAYS—Messrs. Bond, Briggs, Cranston, Curtis, Davies, Deberry, Evans, Grinnell, Habersham, Hawes, Ogden Heffman, Jenifer, Lincoln, McKay, Morgan, Rayner, Russell, Stanly, Storrs, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Trumbull, and Joseph L. Williams—20.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. RUSSELL then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next. He alluded to the great length of time which had elapsed since the date of the claim, say 1798; and considering that, asked what gentleman there was who would undertake to say that we could have any thing like a correct knowledge of the occurrences of that time. Generations had passed away, and now, when after the lapse of so many years, we were called upon to act upon the claim, was it not proper that we should obtain as correct information as possible? What was the information which the House had before it, and on which it was asked to grant this claim? Why, we were obliged to rely on the frail memory of man for the evidence in relation to it. But were there no other sources from which better information could be obtained? Certainly there was. By a reference to the papers at the Treasury Department, it could be ascertained whether Government ever received this money or not. He wished to cast no imputation on the gentlemen who supported the bill; but if it should, upon investigation, turn out that this money had never been realized by Government, who was there, he would ask, who would vote for such a claim? What gentleman would, under such circumstances, vote for the passage of the bill? He was sure there vote, was not a single man who would give his if it could be shown that the money had never been received by the Government. Now his information was, and he believed it to be correct, that the money never had been paid into the Treasury, and that not a single dollor had ever been received by Government. He believed the facts in the report, in relation to the conviction and imprisonment of Matthew Lyon, were true; and, also, that the amount of the fine was raised by his political friends, and the money was deposited with the marshal, in whose custody he was. But, on Mr. Jefferson's coming into power, and before the money was paid into the Treasury, he believed the fine was remitted, and returned to the source from whence it came. Now what he wanted was, proper time to examine into the real state of the facts, and it was for this reason he wished the further consideration of the bill postponed until Friday next.

Mr. BUTLER of Kentucky wished to make a few brief remarks in relation to the merits of this bill. It had been said that, in all probability, the money had never been received by the Government, and that it had been returned. That, he believed, was not the state of the case. It was not true that the bill had ever been rejected. On the contrary, it had been reported by committees from year to year, all of which reports were in favor of the claim.

But there was one fact which would serve to show on what erroneous grounds gentlemen would sometimes base their arguments against bills of this character. The gentleman had said that the fine was remitted when Mr. Jefferson came into power, whereas the money was paid when Lyon was in jail, in 1799, nearly three years before; and could it be presumed that the marshal kept the money in his hands all that time? If the gentleman had been so informed, he was very much mistaken. He was sure that no evidence could be brought to show that the fine had been remitted; and on the other side, there was abundant testimony to show that it had been paid, no matter whether by Lyon himself or by his friends. He appealed to the House whether it was not a disgrace to the country that a claim of this character had remained unpaid for the lapse of so many years. But he saw the object of the gentleman in wishing to postpone it. His object was to kill it by time, in which way it had been the practice to kill other bills, when no good reason could be assigned against their passage. He repeated, that there was abundant testimony to show that the fine had been paid, but there was no evidence to show that it had been returned.

But the gentleman had said a great deal about the money having been paid by the friends of Mr. Lyon. Now of what consequence was that? What did it matter, and how could it affect the case, whether the money had been paid by Lyon himself or his friends?

Mr. TURNEY, after alluding to the great number of years which this claim had been suffered to remain unacted upon, asked whether, during the lapse of all that time, such a ground of opposition had been taken before? Of all the reports which had been made on the subject, none ever attempted to deny that the money had been received by Government. The only ground of opposition had been that the money was raised by the friends of Matthew Lyon instead of himself, and that if it were repaid, it would go into the hands of those who had paid nothing. Now the question was not whether the money had been raised by Lyon or his friends; the question was whether Government could conscientiously retain money in the Treasury paid under such circumstances. As was stated by his friend from Kentucky, it was not likely that a fine paid in 1798 would be remitted by Jefferson three years afterwards, in 1801. It was not likely that the officer would have kept the money in his hands all the time, without paying it into the Treasury. If the fine had ever been remitted, the fact would be shown in some way or other. For his part he had not the least idea but that the money was paid into the Treasury, and has been used by Government from that day to this. But if, after this bill should pass, it should be made to appear that Mr. Lyon did receive back the money, then if no gentleman would move a reconsideration, he would certainly do it himself, in order to retain the bill in the House. Of that, however, he had no idea.

Mr. RICE GARLAND, after some preliminary remarks, said that when this bill had been under consideration in 1832, the committee applied to the Treasury Department to ascertain whether or not the money had ever been paid into the Treasury, and a letter in reply, directed to the Hon. W. R. Davis, stated that the books of the Treasury Department offered no such evidence that the money had ever been received.

Mr. SMITH of Maine was surprised to hear gentlemen say that they would not vote for this bill, unless there was evidence to show that the money had been paid into the Treasury. Now that fact did not operate with him a single straw. Could gentlemen believe that a man who had been convicted under that law, and sentenced under that law, had not paid the penalty, whether it went into the Treasury or not? But the gentlemen who opposed this bill, talked about "living witnesses," and our having to depend on the "frail memory of man." Now, in our legislative transactions, almost every day, did we not act upon, and place implicit reliance on the same kind of evidence? There were a great many facts on which the gentleman himself was fully satisfied supported by the same kind of evidence. But the gentleman complained that there was no evidence in the Treasury Department that the money had ever been paid. What, he would ask, was the absence of such testimony to outweigh the evidence of twenty witnesses that the money had been paid, no matter whether it ever reached the Treasury or not?

But the gentleman had said that he had evidence, satisfactory to his own mind, that the fine had been remitted. Now, on what kind of evidence had he relied, to support his opinion that the fine had been remitted? Was it not derived from "living witnesses," if at all? for there was no record in the Treasury Department to show that the money had ever been repaid; so that the gentleman who refused to act upon evidence derived from the "frail memory of man," in favor of the bill, would, it seemed, take that same kind of evidence against it. Another objection was that the money had been paid by the friends of Matthew Lyon. Now what did that amount to? How could it affect the case, so far as we were concerned, whether the money was raised by Lyon himself, or his friends? If, however, it had been raised by his friends, that fact told a great deal in his favor, as the fact of his having such friends, who expended their own money for his release, was strong evidence of the injustice of the sentence, and of the character of Lyon himself, which could thus induce them to act so promptly in his favor. For his own part, he did not believe there had ever been a claim before the House which was supported by more satisfactory evidence. Here this claim had been before Congress a long series of years, and had been reported numbers of times, after undergoing the most rigid scrutiny; and was that fact to have no weight? Why, the very fact of the bill having passed through the strict scrutiny of the Committee of Claims, was of itself almost conclusive evidence that it ought to pass.

But the House had not only been told so once, but they had been thus assured twenty times, that this was a just claim. Now how did the gentleman propose to act? Why, in the face of all this evidence, his cry was, that we had not sufficient time, and that the bill must be postponed until Friday next. This was probably the same cry at the last session, and at all previous sessions, when it was found that nothing else could be said against it. If this bill should be deferred until Friday, the probability was that it would not come up again during the session, and then, at the next session, it would come again in the jam of a mass of other bills, and very likely would not be reached until the end of the session; and thus it would, as had been well observed, be killed by time, and nothing else. And thus it was that gentlemen proposed to deal with righteous and just claims. He hoped, however, that justice would prevail, and that the bill, which had been delayed so many years, would pass now. There was abundant evidence to show that the money had been paid, but there was none to show that it had been repaid.

Mr. BRIGGS said he should vote for the postponement. The letter just read by the gentleman from Louisiana showed that the money had not gone into the Treasury. If so, that was sufficient reason for taking time to examine how the case stood. There was at least presumptive evidence that the money had been repaid, if it had ever been paid at all. He would remind gentlemen that this transaction took place at the close of the Administration of the elder Adams, who was succeeded by Jefferson, and, with him, a revolution in public opinion. It was well known that Jefferson remitted all unexecuted judgments founded upon the sedition law. But what answer could gentlemen make to this? If Matthew Lyon paid the money, why did he not come before the Congress that succeeded? Why had a period of twenty-five years been suffered to elapse before the claim was presented? If Lyon had paid the money, was it not to be inferred that he would have come before the very next Congress and demanded restitution? and when a majority in both Houses of his political friends would have been quick to restore the money. It might be said, however, that the party to which Lyon belonged, had conscientious scruples on the subject. But a reference to the acts of Jefferson and the Congress at that time, showed that they had no such scruples. Mr. B. concluded by saying that the fact of no claim being presented to that Congress, was presumptive evidence that there was no claim to make. He would therefore vote in favor of the postponement, so that the true facts might be known.

Mr. JAMESON said the only question was, whether the money had been paid. Of that, in his mind, there could be no doubt. It was true, the claim had not been presented for a number of years, but that was probably owing to the pride of Lyon, which kept him from applying sooner, and it was only when poverty compelled him, that he at last presented his claim He himself then petitioned, and the facts are, that he paid the money. Five or six committees have reported that the money has never been repaid to him, and that was sufficient. With these views, and believing that the bill ought to be passed at once, he moved the previous question; but subsequently withdrew it at the request of Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, who wished to say a few words on the subject. It did seem to him that the House, in rejecting this bill on the supposition that the money had not been paid, and that, too, in opposition to the reports of its own committees, would establish a precedent, which would be found to be extremely inconvenient. The great object in referring it to a committee had been to ascertain that fact, and after the report had been made, he for one would not undertake to question the report, unless the evidence to the contrary should be very strong indeed. How very strong was the evidence in favor of its claim. It had been the subject of numerous reports, only two of which were adverse to it; it had been before Congress for twenty years, and yet, after this long period, for the first time, this new objection was started, "that the money had never been paid." Out of all the reports, there had been but two adverse to it, and even in those not the slightest imputation was made, that the money had not been paid.

The hour having arrived, the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess—

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON was about to resume his remarks, when he gave way to

Mr. LINCOLN, who wished to say a few words in explanation of the vote he gave in the morning against the bill.

After some remarks in relation to the Alien and Sedition laws, which were not heard by the Reporter, Mr. L. proceeded to say, that among other things he desired to be understood by his constituents was, that one motive for voting against the bill was induced by the constructive principle which will alone protect the Treasury and the country, and which would always induce him to vote against appropriations, unless the reasons were sufficiently strong to warrant him in supporting them.

In what situation, said Mr. L. was I placed this morning, when I was called upon to vote on a question, which it appears has been argued heretofore in the councils of this nation, and on which a difference of opinion had existed among the men who had given direction to those councils?

How stood the case? Why, the bill which had been committed to a Committee of the Whole for the express purpose of debate, had been reported from the committee without any opportunity for debate.

Messrs. TURNEY and BRIGGS here made some explanation as to the reasons for reporting the bill.

Mr. LINCOLN resumed. He said he did not mean to complain of the conduct of any gentleman; but his object in rising was simply to give the reasons why he could not vote for the bill; and the fact of its being reported from the Committee of the Whole, without opportunity for debate, was one of those reasons. He wished his reasons to be understood by his old Republican friends at home, that his objections were founded on strict Democratic principles. He would repeat, that one reason why he had voted against the bill was, that there was no opportunity for discussing and understanding the merits of a bill, which made a claim in relation to an event forty-two years ago, and which proposed to take thousands of dollars from the Treasury. The bill had been referred to a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of having its merits discussed, and yet it had so happened, that it was taken out of committee, by misapprehension, without any opportunity for getting the information that was sought. That was yesterday; and the first thing this morning the bill was presented for engrossment, and the previous question asked, and ordered.

He appealed to gentlemen and to the country whether it was right to call on him, a new member, to vote to take three or four thousand dollars from the public Treasury, when there had not been the slightest opportunity for discussing the merits of the claim. He was perfectly willing to go to the country on this question, and in the position he had taken. He also appealed to those gentlemen who had voted in favor of the bill, whether it was their duty so to do, before they had fully and fairly discussed the matter, and satisfied themselves that the claim was one of debt and of law. He wished to be understood as having no objection to any just claim, and if, after it had been satisfactorily shown that this Matthew Lyon, or his heirs, were fairly entitled to the money, he would be one of the first to grant it.

This was the defence for the vote he had given. But he would not rest it there. He was one of those who would ever take the responsibility of a negative vote, whenever he could not, for want of sufficient and satisfactory knowledge, give an affirmative one. But if this money had been paid by Lyon in 1798, was it not to be inferred that, when Jefferson came into power, it would have been restored? Then are we not bound to infer that full and prompt justice would have been done, and that the money which had been wrested from the pockets of a citizen would be restored? Was it likely that the administration of Mr. Jefferson would have refused that justice, which we now, forty years afterwards, were called upon to render? Were we now more Democratic, or more jealous than they?

In adverting to the alien and sedition laws, Mr. L. in the course of his remarks, was understood to say, that although he was not so old as those recollections would seem to imply, yet he had learned a great deal from the history of his country, and what had come down to him from his forefathers, who with himself had ranked among the true Democracy of the country, until 1835, when he believed he ceased to be endorsed by the gentleman from Maine as any longer a true Republican, but a degenerate branch from a true vine. Notwithstanding this, however, he believed he was still as true a Republican in integrity of heart as they were.

Mr. W. THOMPSON of South Carolina here claimed the floor, as he thought the gentleman would, after the evidence he was about to give, be perfectly satisfied that the bill ought to pass. He claimed the floor for the object of saving his friend from exerting his acknowledged power against the bill. After he should have made his remarks, he would venture to say that there was not a single man upon that floor who would vote against the bill. He would pledge himself that after he had done, no one would be found who would question the fact that the money had been paid, and that it had not been refunded.

How stands this matter? Why, a man who ranked among the patriots of his country, who was cast into prison under an odious law—one who deserved a monument, and had it in the heart of every true man, and who stood up, one in ten thousand, against power and corruption, yet this man was entitled to no thanks from those who came after him. Here was a man, who, like the illustrious patriot of England, John Hampden, had stood up against power in high places, for which he had suffered ignominy, and been thrust into the cell of a felon, and yet, in these times, objection was made to remunerating his heirs, because the man had been too poor to pay the fine himself. That country must be base, indeed, which would sanction such a plea. That country no longer deserved to be free which would deny justice to a suffering patriot on such grounds. In all the reports which had been made, it had never been denied that the money was paid. Yet gentlemen, at this late period, thought proper to start that objection, and upon rumor, mere floating rumor, had expressed their belief that it had never been paid. But the opposition of gentlemen was not consistent, for, first, it was contented that the money was not paid at all; and, second, that the money had been raised by Lyon's friends, and that, on that ground, the bill ought not to pass. But were we to legislate in this kind of a way, where was the use of our referring subjects of this nature to committees, if we paid no regard to the reports of those committees. Yet the reports of committees were disregarded, and reliance placed on mere rumor that the money had not been paid. Mr. T. here produced a copy of the sentence of Matthew Lyon to four months' imprisonment and a thousand dollars fine, with costs, and which required that he should stand committed until the sentence had been complied with. He also produced a copy of the order of the President of the United States to the marshal of Vermont, requiring him to keep Lyon in custody until the fine and costs were paid. Yes (said Mr. T.) to keep him in jail until he rotted, unless the money should be paid. Mr. T. then produced a copy of the certificate from the marshal that the terms of the sentence had been complied with, and that Matthew Lyon was consequently discharged. This was dated the 9th of February, 1799, four months after the sentence had been passed. Now, said Mr. T. will any one say that the marshal had a right to discharge Matthew Lyon before the terms of the sentence had been complied with? Will any one suppose for a moment that the officer dared to discharge him before the fine was paid? But gentlemen contended that this money never came into the Treasury. What had that to do with the question? If the marshal had not done his duty by not forwarding the money to the Treasury, was that any reason why Matthew Lyon should not have justice? Would gentlemen contend, because Swartwout had absconded with Government money, that the merchants of New York were bound to pay over again the duties on their goods? Certainly not. Then he was surprised to hear gentlemen argue that because it was doubtful whether this fine was ever paid into the Treasury, justice should not be done to this patriot. As for the fine having been remitted, what evidence was there to lead to such a belief? He apprehended that Mr. Adams did not remit the fine; there could be no reason for supposing that; and as for its being remitted by Mr. Jefferson, was it likely that a fine paid in 1799, would be remitted three years afterwards, in 1801? Here were the terms of the sentence, condemning Lyon to four months' imprisonment and a fine of $1,000, with costs; and here, too, was the certificate of the officer that the terms of the sentence had been complied with, and that the man was accordingly discharged. The date of the commitment was the 10th of October, 1798, and the date of the certificate February 9, 1799—just four months, the period of imprisonment designated. Now what could gentlemen want more to satisfy them that the money had been paid? But to show the great danger there was in taking only ex parte testimony in such cases, he would advert to the paper read by his friend from Louisiana, [Mr. R. GARLAND,] which stated that there was no record in the Treasury Department of the money having been received. That paper was a letter addressed to the Hon. Warren R. Davis, than whom a man with a purer heart and a better head never lived. Now what did Mr. Davis say in his report on the subject? Why, in speaking of the money, he said, "which was paid, as appears by the archives of the proceedings," etc. How dangerous was it, then, to take a single scrap of testimony, without embracing the whole. The gentleman from Louisiana himself discovered his error, and with a promptitude which did him much credit, furnished to him (Mr. T.) the certificates he had just read. He gave the gentleman from Louisiana great credit for his constant vigilance in watching over the interests of the country; but it was evident to all that there was great danger in relying upon ex parte testimony. Now, after what he had read, would any gentleman get up and defend the Government against this claim? Would any one say that this Lyon could be discharged without payment of his fine, any more than a defendant who had been committed for debt, without payment of that debt? Here was the testimony of Mr. Davis in his report, speaking of the money as having been paid, and also the certificate of the marshal to show that the fine had been exacted from this patriot, who dared to stand up for those great rights which Milton praised as above all others which man could enjoy, viz: the right to speak, to write, or to publish. It was nothing to us how the money was raised to pay that fine—whether it was raised by a prize in the lottery, or by a subscription among his friends. The fact was, the money had been paid. But (said Mr. T.) if there was no other way of getting rid of the money, I would burn it, rather than it should remain to pollute the Treasury any longer. The country ought to be glad of any excuse of getting rid of money wrung from the pockets of a patriot by such an odious law. If no other way could be found to dispose of it, it would be far better to burn it, rather than it should remain to pollute the Treasury. And if I were at all inclined to be superstitious, I should believe that all the evils which have affected the country since 1799, may be attributed to the odious fine being deposited in the Treasury. Mr. T. concluded by hoping that no further opposition would be made to the bill, as there could be no one but who believed that the law under which the fine was imposed was a violation of the Constitution.

Mr. WELLER believed with the gentleman from South Carolina, that the alien and sedition law was a violation of the Constitution, but at the same time he believed there were those in the country who believed it to have been in strict accordance with the Constitution. If he remembered correctly, he thought he had read a very long argument, by a gentleman now a member of the House, in favor of that law. The gentleman from South Carolina had said enough to satisfy every one that the bill ought to pass, and the only question to be decided was, whether the money had been paid. If the money had been paid by Matthew Lyon, it seemed to follow as a matter of course that it ought to be repaid. He believed with the gentleman, that the Treasury ought no longer to be contaminated—no, not for a single day, by money drawn from the pockets of a patriot, and placed in tis vaults.

It would not do for gentlemen to say that the money never reached the Treasury, and make that an excuse. If the money had been paid over to the officer, and that officer squandered it, was that any reason why Matthew Lyon should suffer? Because evidence did not appear in the Treasury Department that the money had been received, was that ro overthrow the great mass of testimony which appeared, that the money had been paid by Lyon? Was it not just that the House should act on this question, after it had been delayed for so long a time? It had been already delayed long enough. Year after year had passed away, and was it not very ungrateful for us, in 1840, to deny justice, which had been neglected for so long a period? He hoped the bill would pass, without further delay; and, believing that every gentleman was of the same opinion, he moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. POPE, who wished to state a few facts in relation to this claim.

Mr. P. then went on, at some length, to state that he had been intimately acquainted with Mr. Lyon, who served in Congress with him, in the time of Jefferson, and that it was never doubted that the fine had been paid. It was understood, however, that the money had been made up by Mr. Lyon's friends. On concluding, Mr. P. according to his pledge, renewed the motion for the previous question.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a call of the House, but it was not in order.

Mr. SLADE earnestly appealed to have the motion for the previous question withdrawn, when

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. TURNEY asked for the yeas and nays; which having been ordered,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS withdrew the motion.

Mr. WELLER consented to have the previous question withdrawn; and

Mr. SLADE went into a statement of the facts of the case, the conviction of Lyon having taken place in Mr. S's district. He stated the circumstances of indignity accompanying the imprisonment—his being paraded through the district, thrown into a loathsome jail, and deprived of the use of pen, ink, and paper. The Democrats of the day gathered in a great assembly round the jail—an assembly not equalled by any Mr. S. had ever seen, save the grand convention at Baltimore—and a voluntary contribution was called for and taken up; but before it could be applied, the fine had been paid, either through the intervention of Col. Lyon's friends in another county, or by his own means. As soon as Lyon was at the jail door, he proclaimed that he was on his way to Congress. The cavalcade which attended him was half a mile long—stopped at his father's house, and there all partook of cakes and hard cider, in true Democratic style. Mr. S. did not believe the fine had ever been remitted by Jefferson or by Congress.

Mr. S. concluded by renewing the motion for the previous question.

A question of order arose as to the time when the bill should have its third reading.

The previous question was seconded, put, and carried, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time now; it was read accordingly, when

Mr. TURNEY moved the previous question, which was seconded, put, and carried; and the main question being on the passage of the bill, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 124, nays 15.

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bond, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Calhoun, William B. The bill for the relief of Joseph Roby, after some remarks by Messrs. WALKER, SEVIER, and YOUNG, was indefinitely postponed—ayes 25, noes 6.

The CHAIR submitted a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the proceedings instituted to try the title to the Peapatch island, and recommending to Congress to pass a special act, giving to the circuit court of the district of Maryland jurisdiction to try the cause; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The CHAIR also submitted the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate:

I communicate to Congress sundry papers, from which it will be perceived that the Imaum of Muscat has transmitted to this country, and, through the agency of the commander of one of his vessels, offered for my acceptance, a present, consisting of horses, pearls, and other articles of value. The answer of the Secretary of State to a letter from the agents of the vessel communicating the offer of the present, and my own letter to the Imaum, in reply to one which he addressed to me, were intended to make known in the proper quarter the reasons which had precluded my acceptance of the proffered gift. Inasmuch, however, as the commander of the vessel, with the view, as he alleges, of carrying out the wishes of his sovereign, now offers the presents to the Government of the United States, I deem it my duty to lay the proposition before Congress for such disposition as they may think fit to make of it; and I take the opportunity to suggest for their consideration the adoption of legislative provisions pointing out the course which they may deem it proper for the Executive to pursue in any future instances where offers of presents by foreign States, either to the Government, its legislative or executive branches, or its agents abroad, may be made under circumstances precluding a refusal without the risk of giving offence.

The correspondence between the Department of State and our Consul at Tangier, will acquaint Congress with such an instance in which every proper exertion on the part of the Consul to refrain from taking charge of an intended present, proved unavailing. The animals constituting it may, consequently, under the instructions of the Secretary of State, be expected soon to arrive in the United States, when the authority of Congress, as to the disposition to be made of them, will be necessary.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, May, 21, 1840.

[The following is a portion of the documents.]

One package Cashmere Shawls,
One bale Persian Rug,
One box Pearls,
One box—Sword.

We beg to be favored by your Excellency's instructions, as to disposition and delivery of thos articles.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants, BARCLAY & LIVINGSTON.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT of the U. S.
Washington.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washing on, 7th May, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: I am directed by the President to acknowledge the receipt of your letters to him of the 2d and 5th instant, informing him of the arrival, at your port, of the ship Sultanee, commanded by Ahmet Ben Haman, and bearing presents from his Highness, the Imaum of Muscat, for the President.

The President will avail himself of the return of the Sultanee, to forward an answer to the friendly communication which he received from his Highness, and will express at the same time the lively satisfaction he derives from this first visit of a vessel from the Sultan's dominions to the United States, and his sense of the friendly disposition evinced by his Highness in the presents which Ahmit Ben Haman is instructed to offer in his name. Those presents the President is, under existing constitutional provisions, precluded from accepting for his own use. I have, therefore, to request that you will apprize Ahmet Ben Haman of the circumstance, that such other disposition of the articles may be made by him as will best comport with the wishes of the Sultan.

I am, gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
JOHN FORSYTH.

Messrs. BARCLAY and LIVINGSTON, New York.

To His Excellency MARTIN VAN BUREN, President of the United States of North America, Washington:

SIR: Hope the Almighty God will protect you, and keep you in good health. From this part of the world, having no news to communicate them to your Excellency; and, whenever opportunity offers for this place, we shall feel happy to hear from your Excellency. With any thing that we can do for you, little or plenty, shall feel happy.

Written by the order of His Highness,
SEYD SEYD BIN SULTAN BIN AHMED,
Imaum of Muscat.

SYED BIN, Calfaun.

Dated MUSCAT, 25th December, 1839.

To His Highness SYED BIN SULTAN, Imaum of Muscat, MARTIN VAN BUREN, President of the United States of America—Greeting:

GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND: By the hands of Ahmet Ben Haman, commanding your Highness's ship Sultanee, I had the satisfaction of receiving your Highness's letter of the 19th of the Moon of Shawal, and 1,255 of the Hegira. It has been a source of lively satisfaction to me, in my desire that frequent and beneficial intercourse should be established between our respective countries, to behold a vessel bearing your Highness's flag enter a port of the United States, to testify, I hope, that such relations will be reciprocal and lasting.

I am informed that Ahmet Ben Haman had it in charge from your Highness to offer for my acceptance, in your name, a munificent present. I look upon this friendly proceeding on your part as a new proof of your Highness's desire to cultivate with us amicable relations; but a fundamental law of the Republic, which forbids its servants from accepting presents from foreign States or Princes, precludes me from receiving those your Highness intended for me. I beg your Highness to be assured that, in thus declining your valuable gift, I do but perform a paramount duty to my country, and that, my sense of the kindness which prompted the offer is not thereby in any degree abated.

Wishing health and prosperity to your Highness, power and stability to your Government, and to your people tranquillity and happiness, I pray that God may have you, great and good friend, in his holy keeping.

M. VAN BUREN.

By the President:
JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State.

Washington, May 8, 1840.

The message and documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill for the establishment of a general bankrupt law coming up for consideration,

Mr. HUBBARD addressed the Senate at great length and with much ability, in opposition to the bill reported by the majority of the committee, believing it to be inexpedient and of doubtful constitutionality. He expressed his determination to vote against any bill which authorized compulsory bankruptcy against the agricultural classes—and contended that all the objections which were urged against subjecting banks and other incorporations to the operations of a bankrupt law, would apply with as much force in the case of individuals. He concluded by saying, that if the substitute proposed by Mr. WALL was adopted, with certain modifications, he would probably give his vote for the bill.

Mr. WALL stated that he had no objection to the modification suggested by his honorable friend from New Hampshire. His object was, as he had several times stated, to pass a uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy; not a partial or special law of bankruptcy. Understanding the Constitution as he did, he thought that we had no constitutional power to pass a mere insolvent law, having no principle or features of a law on the subject of bankruptcy, but the discharging of the debtor from the obligation of his contracts with his creditors. The Constitution gives us no power to pass a law of bankruptcy. The fact of bankruptcy or insolvency does not give Congress authority to act, or to discharge debtors from their contracts, without payment, and without the consent of their creditors. Bankruptcy does not bring the bankrupt and his creditors and their contracts within the constitutional power of Congress. Bankruptcy is not the subject of bankruptcy. The subject of bankruptcy is something else. The Constitution gives us power to pass a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy; not a law of bankruptcy, or insolvency, or concerning bankruptcy or insolvency. He who maintains such a power, assumes the task of vindicating such a latitudinarian construction. But while I am willing to accept such amendments as will make this system acceptable, I do not doubt our powers to make the exception, nor do I wish in that way to lose two friends to gain one. In making this concession, I by no means yield to the soundness of the argument of my honorable friend. I have heretofore submitted my views as to the meaning of the word uniform. It is a limitation of the power of Congress to pass a law on the subject of bankruptcy—not territorially or locally—but as to the classes and subject-matter upon upon which such law shall operate. Congress may, after defining the classes upon which it shall operate—for instance, traders—declare who, falling within the technical meaning, shall not be operated on by the law. So as to banks or corporations. If you except all classes falling within the same categories, from its operation, you may do so without destroying its uniformity.

Sir, I will take this occasion to submit another remark. The party of which I am an humble member, have been charged with being Loco Focos, agrarians, Fanny Wright men, enemies of the banks and of the credit system. Those who make this charge have submitted a bill which tests the truth of such charges and accusations. If I wanted to destroy the banks—to put an end to credit, honest, legitimate credit, which springs from confidence—I would vote for this bill. Banks are debtors; but where they are debtors one dollar, they are creditors to five or ten times the amount. Give their debtors the bill reported by the majority, the means of destroying their contract, without payment; drawer and endorser will travel the same road, and the banks must fall, and the whole credit system must perish by the acts of its friends, not its foes. Will not the avowed friends of the banks and the credit system pause in their career?

I have thought myself a tolerable good Loco Foco, as the slang of the day has vainly attempted to characterize the party to which I belong; but this bill is too Loco Focoish for me. I leave its supporters to reconcile their accusations with the conduct of myself and those who act with me, and their own conduct with their own professions. The public will judge between us.

Mr. HENDERSON, in reply to Mr. HUBBARD, admitted that this power over bankruptcy was more liable to abuse and assumption than almost any other, and it was especially for that very reason that he would now confine the exercise of that power to the sole object of relieving debtors, which, and which alone, the country now emphatically demanded.

Mr. H. also argued further to show that Congress, like the British Parliament, has the power to include any and all classes of persons which they may think proper.

On motion of Mr. STRANGE, the subject was laid over till to-morrow; and, after an Executive session,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, MAY 25, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Post Office Department, in compliance with the 2d section of the act of July, 1836, enclosing a report of contracts for the transportation of the mail within the last year, with an abstract of offers, and other particulars in relation thereto.

On motion of Mr. JONES of New York, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the motion of Mr. DAVIS of Indiana, to refer the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, in relation to the Cumberland road, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill for the continuation of said road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and the question immediately pending when the House adjourned on Monday last, when the subject was up, was on the question, "Shall the main question (on the adoption of the instructions) be put?" On that motion the yeas and nays had been ordered.

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, a call of the House was ordered and proceeded in till 155 members answered to their names. The list of absentees was then called over for excuses, when the following gentlemen were excused for unavoidable absence from the city, indisposition, etc. viz: Messrs H. J. ANDERSON, BREWSTER, DAVIES, J. W. DAVIS, GRANGER, HOFFMAN, LAWRENCE, J. W. JONES, NAYLOR, REED, RYALL, P. F. THOMAS, VROOM, and S. WILLIAMS.

On motion of Mr. WELLER, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with.

The question was then taken whether the main question should be put, which was on the adoption of the instructions and reference, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 62.

Mr. PECK called for a division of the question, so as to take the question first on the reference, and then on the instructions.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer, and decided in the affirmative.

The question recurring on the instructions, and the yeas and nays having been asked and ordered on the same, were—yeas 87, nays 90.

Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—90.

So the House refused to adopt the instructions.

Mr. WICK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolutions were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. His object in making such a motion, was with the view that the said resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire whether the obligation does not rest on the Government to complete said road; and he said he would be glad to see a report on the subject from the Judiciary Committee. He thought such a report would bring a true view of the matter before those interested, and tend to settle a vexed question.

Mr. DAWSON moved to lay said motion on the table.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 51.

The SPEAKER then continued the call of the States for petitions; when petitions were presented

By Mr. HOWARD of Indiana.

By Mr. STUART, of Illinois.

By Messrs. HUBBARD and CHAPMAN, of Alabama.

By Mr. CROSS, of Arkansas.

By Mr. DOWNING, of Florida; and

By the SPEAKER, on behalf of the citizens of Florida, who presented a petition praying that Florida may be attached to the State of Alabama. Also, a remonstrance against the same.

By Mr. DOTY, of Wiskonsin.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa, in accordance with notice heretofore given, asked leave to report a bill to change the mode of selling the public lands, so as to prevent sudden drains of the circulating medium, and prevent fluctuations in the revenue derived from the sale of lands.

Objection having been made to its reception,

Mr. CHAPMAN inquired of the CHAIR whether it was in order to make some remarks explanatory of the bill.

The CHAIR replied that it was not.

Mr. CHAPMAN then presented a petition from citizens of Iowa, praying compensation for horses lost in the service of the United States, which he moved to refer to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS said the Committee of Claims was the proper one to which it should be referred, and accordingly made that motion.

Mr. CHAPMAN said, his reason for moving its reference to the Committee on the Territories, was, that the committee was not so pressed with business as the Claims Committee, and the subject would therefore have earlier attention by giving it that reference.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. CHAPMAN, and disagreed to; and the petition was then referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a petition from citizens of Iowa, praying that the Governor of said Territory might be elected by the people; which,

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN, was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Petitions were further presented by Messrs. ALLEN, TAYLOR, and CALVARY MORRIS, of Ohio.

[Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of F. W. Bingham and many other citizens of Cuyahoga county, Ohio, praying that adequate protection may be given by Congress for the growth and manufacture of silk in the United States.]

[Mr. TAYLOR presented a preamble and resolutions, passed by the General Assembly of Ohio, in relation to the currency, instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives, to support such measures as shall be calculated to separate the connection between the Federal Government and the banks, and particularly to vote for and support the measure which is usually called the Independent Treasury bill: ordered to lie on the table and be printed. Mr. T. also presented the petition of Timothy Cavin, a soldier of the late war, asking an invalid pension.]

By Messrs. BELL, CROCKETT, and CARTER, of Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. CARTER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of changing the times of the sittings of the Federal courts at Knoxville, Tennessee, so as to avoid interfering with the sittings of the State courts in East Tennessee.

By Messrs. POPE, TRIPLETT, WHITE, and GRAVES, of Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky again moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to present the resolution in relation to the freedom of elections, &c. &c. which he moved to present on last Saturday, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE appealed to the gentleman to withdraw his motion, and not to embarrass the business, by arresting the reception of petitions. The motion to suspend the rules could be made at any time.

The yeas and nays having been refused on the motion to suspend the rules, the question was taken, and decided in the negative, without a count.

By Messrs. HABERSHAM and BLACK, of Georgia.

On motion of Mr. HABERSHAM, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the late Captain John Jackson, of the revenue service, now deceased, a credit of $750, on the books of the Treasury Department, which sum now stands charged against him on said books.

By Messrs. WISE, BOTTS, GOGGIN, CRAIG, and TALIAFERRO, of Virginia.

Mr. CRAIG offered the following, which, being objected to, lies over one day:

Whereas, one of the contingent clerks employed in the Clerk's office of this House, a part of the year 1836 and 1837, which said clerk performed duties in common with other clerks in the office, but did not receive the same compensation as other contingent clerks for like services; it is, therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to inquire into the expediency and justness of allowing the aforesaid clerk a sum equal in amount to that received by other contingent clerks employed in said office, during the same period of time, viz: from the 15th of May, 1836, to the 4th of September, 1837.

On motion of Mr. J. GARLAND,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Travillian's depot, in the county of Louisa, by Poindexter's store, to Bootright's, on the Three Notched road, in the same county.

On motion of Mr. GOGGIN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to Mary Morgan, widow of Reese Morgan, of the county of Franklin, Virginia, whose evidence and other papers are now on file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions.

By Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, of Maryland.

By Messrs. HENRY, MARCHAND, NEWHARD, EDWARDS, BEATTY, and HAMMOND, of Pennsylvania.

On motion of Mr. MARCHAND,

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing John Flood, a soldier of the late war, on the pension roll, and that the accompanying papers be referred to the same committee.

By Messrs. MARVIN, PECK, MORGAN, GRINNELL, FLOYD, DANA, and J. C. CLARK, of New York.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to A. W. Morse and Jared Buckingham, and that the accompanying papers be referred to said committee.

Resolved, That the memorial of Phineas Allen, and the papers accompanying the same, be recommitted to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

On motion of Mr. DANA,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Elizabeth Gibbs, and that the papers in the Pension Office in relation to her claim, be referred to such committee.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a petition from citizens of Oneida county, in the State of New York, praying that Congress would prohibit the use of ardent spirits in the army and navy, and its sale to the Indians, and to prohibit its sale in the Capitol to members of Congress and others.

Mr. RAMSEY moved to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 65, nays 82.

So the House having refused to lay the petition on the table,

On motion of Mr. MARVIN, it was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. EVERETT, of Vermont.

By Messrs. ADAMS, BRIGGS, CUSHING, and LINCOLN, of Massachusetts.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN,

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Pensions be directed to transmit to this House the application of Aaron Miller of Massachusetts, a soldier in the late war with Great Britain, for an invalid pension, with the papers filed in support of said application, and that they be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. ADAMS said, that among other petitions entrusted to his care, was one from an individual containing charges of a serious nature against Judge McLean of Ohio. For some time after he had received the petition, he had entertained doubts as to the propriety of his presenting it. But, upon reading that petition, he had discovered that it involved questions of the highest importance to this Union, and that had induced him to present it to the House, as he had come to the conclusion that such would be his duty. He would state that he had no personal acquaintance with the complainant, nor did he know any thing of his character, except from the papers which had been placed in his hands. The complaint was, however, of a character which deserved the most serious attention of the House, and involved questions of the deepest importance to the existence of this Union. It involved questions with respect to the power of the Congress of the United States over the construction of ordinances of the Government of the Northwestern Territory, and with respect to the sovereign power of the States, and in relation to the navigation of the rivers which connected those places. The memorial, he repeated, involved, therefore, the sovereign power of the States and of this Union. It also involved the conduct of a judge of one of the United States courts, and several citizens in one of those States. It appeared that this high officer was charged with depriving the complainant of the right to appeal to the Superior Court of the United States, &c.

Mr. A. said that, in presenting this petition, he did not propose the printing of it, nor even that it should be read. He was aware of the extreme delicacy there was in thus presenting a complaint to the grand inquest of the nation, against an officer so distinguished in character as Judge McLean: and he had long hesitated on the propriety of presenting, until he had read the petition. After so doing, he no longer hesitated; for he was convinced, on the perusal of the papers, that questions of such deep importance were involved, that it was his duty to present the petition for the consideration of the House. The memorial was very long, and contained eighteen specifications of charges against Judge McLean, drawn up with great ability; he therefore presented it together with the papers. He would move a reference of the whole to the Committee on the Judiciary, with a special request to the members thereof that they would bestow upon this case the most serious attention. In his own mind, after serious deliberation, he had come to the conclusion that questions were involved which deserved the most attentive consideration. He did not mean to say that he had formed any opinion with respect to the justice of the charges against Judge McLean. He certainly did not wish to prejudge any thing, as he entertained a high feeling of respect towards that officer.

He forbore to ask for the printing, or even the reading of the papers, because he had full confidence in the Judiciary Committee, and was sure that justice would be done to all parties. Neither did he, under present circumstances, think it necessary to call upon the Judge to answer, as it was very probable that, after an examination of the papers, the committee might come to the conclusion that the Judge ought not to be called upon to answer, and that the papers contained nothing requiring any justification. He therefore did not ask even that the papers should be read. If, after an examination, the Judiciary Committee should be of opinion that there was cause for further action, they could report to that effect, and the House might take what action it might deem best.

The petition was then referred sub silentio to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TILLINGHAST wished to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, whether the petition was signed by one person or more.

The CHAIR said, the petition having been referred, the question was not in order.

Mr. CRABB wished to say a few words in relation to this singular petition, and was surprised when the CHAIR announced that it was referred. He wished to have an opportunity of giving his vote on the reference.

The CHAIR said the petition had been referred in the usual mode, like other petitions; but by general consent, he would put the question again, and formally, on the reference.

The question was accordingly put on the motion to refer, and a division was called, but not sustained. The petition was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRABB subsequently made a motion to reconsider the motion to refer the petition. He considered it a subject too grave to be referred without consideration; and was about showing the propriety of reconsidering the reference, but was ruled out of order.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to submit the following resolutions, which were read:

Resolved, That the circuit court of the United States within the district of Connecticut, having decided that the Africans captured in the Amistad were not amenable before itself, or any other court of the United States, for trial of the crimes of piracy and murder committed on the high seas, upon the charge of which against them, they had been captured by Lieutenant Gedney, an executive officer in the service of the United States, and brought before the said circuit court; there exists in the United States no lawful authority to hold the said Africans in captivity within the said State of Connecticut; and all detention or imprisonment of their persons within the said State, without charge against them of any offence against the laws of the United States, or of the said State, is unlawful, arbitrary, and oppressive.

Resolved, That the President of the United States possesses no lawful authority to detain as captives or prisoners, the said Africans, or any of them, by any officer or officers of the United States, whether civil or military, executive or judicial.

Resolved, That there exists no obligation, either in the law of nations, or by any treaty stipulation between the United States and Spain, by which the President of the United States can be required, or is authorized to cause the said Africans to be delivered up to the disposal of the diplomatic representative of Spain, or to any officer of any foreign Government in the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the United States for the punishment of crimes, as to confer upon the courts of the United States, of competent jurisdiction, full power to take cognizance of, try, and adjudicate, in conformity with the laws of nations, all charges against persons accused of the crimes of piracy and murder committed on the high seas in vessels and by subjects or citizens of any nation foreign to the United States, whenever any such person or persons charged with the commission of the said crime or crimes, or either of them, may be found or lawfully brought within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Objection was made to the introduction of the resolution, and it accordingly lies over, under the rule.

Mr. ADAMS asked the consent of the House to offer the following resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Maine objected to the reception of any resolutions at this time. He had many petions to present, and would not agree to the reception of resolutions until the petitions were all received.

Mr. ADAMS moved a suspension of the rules, and the resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the investment in the stocks of the several States of this Union of funds held by the United States in trust, is, to the amount of the sums so invested, and of the interest thereon, an assumption by the United States, in the event of their failure punctually to pay the same.

Resolved, That the purchase, by authority of any Executive Department of the Government of the United States, of the bonds of any of the States of this Union, at the nominal value, or with a premium thereon, and thesubsequent sale of the same bonds at a discount, is an unwarrantable and a wasteful dilapidation of the public funds.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Executive Government of the United States to require of the Government of each and every State of this Union, in whose stocks investments of the public moneys, held in trust by the Government of the United States, have been made, punctual payment in specie, or its equivalent, of the interest stipulated in the said stocks, and repayment of the principal, as soon as possible by the terms of the contracts upon which such contracts have generally been issued.

Resolved, That the further investment of any public funds of the United States in stocks of the several States ought forthwith to be prohibited by law, and that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill for that purpose.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and disagreed to.

The resolution lies over.

By Messrs. BURKE and WILLIAMS of New Hampshire.

Mr. HALL made some remarks in opposition to the motion to concur; and

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi advocated the justness of the amendment of the Senate, and hoped the House would concur.

At this stage of the proceeding, the House, according to order, took a recess.

Mr. HALL of Vermont moved that the bill and amendment be committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A few remarks were made by Messrs. CROSS, PETRIKIN, and POPE, when Mr. P. moved the previous question, which was seconded.

The bill was then informally passed over, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, May 26, 1840.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said, upon an examination of the yeas and nays, on the propostion to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, he found that his name had been omitted. He was firmly impressed with the belief that he had responded to the call of the Clerk, and voted for the instructions. If he did not do it, it was certainly his intention to have voted for the instructions. He therefore hoped the House would permit him to have his vote recorded in favor of the instructions.

It required the unanimous consent of the House to amend the journal in that particular; and

Mr. CRANSTON having objected, on the ground that it might lead to abuses, the request of Mr. S. was refused.

Mr. CROCKETT, by universal consent, presented the following resolution, which was read, and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of allowing pay to Littlejohn Wilkins, John Lynch, Wm. P. Ford, and Alexander H. Patrick, late members of Captain Baker's company, Tennessee volunteers, in service of the United States, in Florida, in 1836, for their horses and equipage turned over to Government.

Mr. BLACKWELL, by the general consent of the House, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to James S. Hall, of Tennessee, and that the papers in the case be referred to the said committee.

Mr. CHINN, by the general consent of the House, prsented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House a copy of the charges preferred by Dr. John Baldwin, a citizen of the State of Louisiana, against Marmaduke Burroughs, Consul at Vera Cruz, together with all such correspondence and proceedings as may have grown out of the same.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to present to the House a resolution, which was read for information, as follows, viz:

Whereas a printed pamphlet has recently been circulated in this city purporting to be an address of Amos Kendall to the people of the United States; which pamphlet charges a portion of the members of this House with "causing the public business to be delayed," "the public faith violated," with "practising unheard-of abuses," and "with violating the laws," and of other practices derogatory to the character of the members of this House: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, whether the said Amos Kendall continued to exercise the duties of Postmaster General on the 21st day of May, 1840, being the day of publishing the said pamphlet. If not, on what day did his commission with said office cease.

Mr. GIDDINGS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which having been ordered, were—yeas 60, nays 102, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Clark, Cranston, Crockett, Edward Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Evans, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Cave Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Mason, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Proffit, Randolph, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Slade, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Blackwell, Boyd, Briggs, Burke, Samuel H. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Cushing, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Eastman, Ely, Everett, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gerry, Goggin, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hillen, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Nisbet, Parrish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Rariden, Reynolds, Rhett, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, John Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—102.

So the rules were not suspended.

The SPEAKER then called the committees for reports; when

Mr. HILLEN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred memorials from pilots of New York, Pennsylvania, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston, praying for the repeal of the law of March 2d, 1837, concerning pilots, offered to make a report from said committee, accompanied by a bill to repeal said law; which he asked to have read.

Mr. CURTIS objected to its reception, on the ground (as a question of order) that it was not the report of the majority of the committee—he himself having been instructed by the majority of that committee to make a report of a directly contrary character.

The report offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILLEN] had, Mr. C. said, once been the report of the majority of the committee; but the vote had, subsequent to its adoption, and before the report had been made to the House, been reconsidered by the committee, in consequence of additional information having been produced, and a large number of remonstrances having been referred to the committee at a date subsequent to the adoption of the said report.

Mr. C. referred to the parliamentary law, (page 135 of the Manual,) where it is laid down that reports once passed by a committee cannot be altered, except by the House, their votes being binding upon them; and contended that this rule had no application, under that law, to the standing committees, but to the Committee of the Whole. The point was now presented whether there could be two majority reports from the same committee, the one being directly adverse to the other.

Mr. HILLEN contended that the reconsideration was a direct violation of the rules; that the whole subject matter contained in the remonstrances spoken of had, in substance, been before the committee previous to the adoption of the report which he had offered; and that the proper course for the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] to have pursued, would have been to have heard it read, and then to have moved its recommitment, offering as an argument in favor of the motion, that new testimony had been introduced—though, in fact, Mr. H. contended, no new testimony had been introduced, the committee having, in substance, the whole of it before them when they agreed upon report.

Some explanations followed between Messrs. CURTIS and HILLEN as to the proceedings which took place in committee, and as to certain conversations which passed between them in relation thereto.

Mr. TOLAND submitted that the House had nothing to do with the proceedings in committee, and the only question for the House to decide was, whether, having taken a vote, the committee had the power to reconsider it. The proposition was too plain, he thought, to need discussion.

Mr. RUSSELL argued generally on the power of the committee to reconsider, and insisted on their right to do so. He had not concluded when, the morning hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. PROFFIT,

The House passed to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States in relation to certain presents transmitted to him by the Sultan of Muscat, and suggesting legislative provision for such cases. Referred, on motion of Mr. CUSHING, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

[The message was published in the Senate proceedings of yesterday.]

PRE-EMPTION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced that the next business in order was the bill granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands. The question immediately pending was the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LINCOLN, as follows:

"Strike out all after the word 'extended,' in the 7th line of the 5th section, and insert—

"To every actual settler on the public lands, being the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, who was in possession, and a householder by personal residence thereon, at the time of passage of this act, and for four months next preceding, with the same exceptions, whether general or special, and subject to all the limitations and conditions contained in the above recited act, and with the explanatory provisions of the preceding sections: Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall not give a right of pre-emption to any lands subject to sale by private entry at the time of the passage hereof: And provided, further, That the continuance hereby in force of the act to which this is supplemental, shall not be construed to extend the time to any settler who has a right of pre-emption under that act, in which to make his entry and payment for said land, and perfect his title thereto, but the same shall be done in the same time and manner as if this act had not been passed."

Mr. LINCOLN then addressed the House at great length in opposition to the bill as it then stood, and in support of his amendment, which he considered would remove the objection. He took a general review of the past policy of the Government in relation to the principle of pre-emption; and although he was willing to leave that principle as it now stood, he could not consent to an extension of it. He then examined the bill by sections, and with much earnestness contended that its operation would be extremely unjust and unequal. In taking a review of all the laws passed on the subject, he showed that every one of them required a previous residence on the land before the privilege was granted, but that this bill contained an entirely new principle, and gave the right to all such persons who might be found on the land at the time of the passage of this act, without requiring any proof of previous residence. He regarded the bill as calculated to produce the most injurious results, and that it was an innovation of the legislation of former Congresses, containing in every section either an extension of old rights, or the creation of new ones.

At this stage of the remarks, the SPEAKER announced that the House would, according to order, take a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. LINCOLN concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill. His remarks will be published hereafter in full.

Mr. WHITE said it was his conviction that the bill was calculated to encourage fraud and afford facilities for the commission of the most corrupt perjury. He thought it a measure of the most odious character, and fraught with the most injurious consequences. The tendency of the course of those who advocated it, was in direct opposition to the best interests of the country. The operation of the measure would be immoral, unconstitutional; it would diminish the revenue; and its provisions were such that he who had least honesty would make the most out of it. Mr. W. denounced the pre-emption settlers as intruders, who had seized on the most eligible places when they had done nothing, nor encountered any of the dangers. They were in no fear, like the early settlers, from the Indians, for now there was a standing army beyond the limits of the Territory to protect them; yes, to protect these very intruders. Had not the old States been taxed to pay for those Indian wars? And yet these intruders went and reaped all the benefit. If this measure was honest and fair, then he would vote for it; but if this bill were passed, it would encourage fraud between debtor and creditor, and its operation would be immoral, as the report of the public officer of Louisiana, just read, showed that perjury of the most unblushing character was invited. It was unconstitutional, because it was opposed to that clause of the Constitution which guarantied equal rights; and it was a robbery, because it would take away that which belonged to others. Mr. W. illustrated the position he had taken at some length, and concluded by denouncing the bill as partial and unfair. He contended that such a subject, involving millions of the public money, ought not to be dealt with in this partial way. If we were to have a pre-emption law, let it be one of a permanent and impartial character.

Mr. HUBBARD, having with some difficulty obtained the floor, said he would make a few remarks in reply to the opponents of the bill, after which he would move the previous question. He considered it due to the supporters of the bill, that some explanation should be made, to show how very weak the objections were which had been urged against it.

Mr. H. then examined the various exceptions taken by Messrs. LINCOLN and WHITE to the bill, and explained its intended operation. He said it was very natural that gentlemen not acquainted with the Western country should start objections of that character; but to those who knew how matters really were, the bill could not fail to be satisfactory. He noticed and replied to all the objection seriatim, but the uproar in the Hall was so great that the Reporter failed in getting the argument. On concluding, however, Mr. H. claimed to have triumphantly answered every objection, and that he had "squared off" with both the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Massachusetts. Mr. H. concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. HOWARD suggested that the House should adjourn and let the question be taken on the bill to morrow.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved that the House adjourn; and on that motion

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 67, nays 87.

So the House resused to adjourn.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which the House refused on count, yeas 47, nays 114.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays on the main question—which main question would be first on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. LINCOLN, and then on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. ANDREWS again moved that the House adjourn; which motion was disagreed to—yeas 55, nays 98.

Mr. LINCOLN modified his amendment so as to amend the bill, by striking out all after the word "extended" in the 7th line of the 5th section, and inserting, "to every actual settler of the public lands, being the head of a family or over twenty-one years of age, who was in possession of a household, by personal residence thereon, at the time of the passage of this act, and from the first of April next preceding, with the same exceptions, whether general or special, and subject to all the limitations and conditions contained in the above recited act, and with the explanatory provisions of the preceding sections. Provided, however, that the provisions of this act shall not give a right of pre-emption to any lands subject to sale by private entry, at the time of the passage hereof. And provided further, that the continuance hereby in force of the act to which this is supplimental, shall not be construed so as to extend the time to any settler who has a right of pre-emption under that act, in which to make his entry and payment for said land, and perfect his title thereto, but the same shall be done in the same time and manner as if this act had not been passed."

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the adoption of the above amendment, were taken, and were—yeas 86, nays 97, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bynum, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carter, Clark, Coles, Connor, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dromgoole, Edwards, Everett, Fisher, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Wm. S. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Holmes, Hunt, Charles Johnston, Cave Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, Mason, Montgomery, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Randolph, Rayner, Russell, Saltonstall, Samuels, Sergeant, Shepard, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Sumter, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Cushing, Dana, John Davis, Dickerson, Dillet, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Galbraith, Hand, J. Hastings, Henry, Hillen, Holleman, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Ed. Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, A. Smith, Tho. Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, P. F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—97.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill to engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. TURNEY moved to reconsider the vote refusing the yeas and nays; and, after a few remarks by Messrs. WISE, R. GARLAND, BRIGGS, and TURNEY, the question was taken and decided in the negative—ayes 197, noes 24.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and having been engrossed, and the question then being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. BOYD demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE said if he could be satisfied that this bill, if passed, would be for the benefit of the poor, actual settler, he would vote for it. He would rather give the land to the poor settler for nothing, than sell the prime lands at $1 25 per acre. He said there were two definitions of the words poor settler; by one it was meant a speculator; and by another definition in the vocabulary, it means sometimes a member of Congress. He disclaimed applying to any member of the present session, or any part, the definition of speculator, though he believed, according to the vocabulary, such was one of the definitions.

Mr. CASEY demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill, which was seconded; and the main question having been ordered, it was taken on the passage of the bill by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 126, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, J. W. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clark, Clifford, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, John Davis, Garret Davis, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Galbraith, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, Green, Hand, John Hastings, Henry, Hillen, Holleman, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Ramsey, Rariden, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Stoenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—126.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Banks, Baker, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, John Campbell, Coles, Connor, James Cooper, Cranston, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Edwards, Everett, Fisher, James Garland, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Holmes, Chas. Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, Montgomery, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Ranpolph, Rayner, James Rogers, Russell, Saltonstal, Samuels, Sergeant, Shepard, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Underwood, Warren, John White, Thomas W Williams, Lewis Williams, and Wise—46.

So the bill was passed.

On motion, the House then, at 9 o'clock, p. m. adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, May 27, 1840.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of Nathaniel Niles for additional compensation for diplomatic services; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of the religious society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, of the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, praying the adoption of measures for the suppression of the African slave trade under the American flag; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial signed by the presidents of the various insurance companies of Philadelphia, and other citizens of Philadelphia, praying an appropriation for the repair of the wharf and piers at Port Penn; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG presented four memorials signed by numerous citizens of Illinois, praying a grant of public land for the improvement of Rock river; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented four memorials, signed by numerous inhabitants of the northern frontier of the United States, praying an appropriation for the construction of a ship canal around the falls of Niagara.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of Henry B. Goodyear and others, praying a grant of land for the purpose of forming a settlement on the island of West Mattacumba, on the coast of Florida; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. D. also presented a memorial of citizens of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, the question on the reception of which was, on motion by Mr. SEVIER, laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition for the release W. L. Mackenzie; and

Mr. NORVELL presented a similar petition; which were respectively laid on the table.

Mr. PIERCE, by direction of the Committee on Pensions, moved that leave be granted to that committee to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. P. remarked that it would be much more agreeable to himself and the gentlemen associated with him to remain in their places, and attend to the interesting debate now in progress, that to devote themselves to the labors of a committee room. But since the one hundred and twenty bills granting pensions in individual cases came up from the House of Representatives in a single day, it had become perfectly obvious that they could not bestow upon the claims the attention due alike to the Government and the claimants, without the indulgence indicated.

The question was then taken on granting the leave, and unanimously agreed to.

The bill for the relief of General Duncan L. Clinch;

The bill to quiet the titles of several claimants to lands in the States of Missouri and Arkansas, and for other purposes;

The bill to authorize the Legislature of the State of Louisiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools within that State;

The bill to perfect the titles to lands south of the Arkansas river, held under New Madrid locations, and pre-emption rights under the act of 1814;

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the duties collected in the French ship Alexander;

were severally read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the vote on the passage of the bill for the relief of Gen. Duncan L. Clinch was reconsidered, and it was then laid on the table.

The bill for the benefit of the Howard Institution of the city of Washington, was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. ALLEN wished some information as to the character and objects of this institution for which so large an amount of the public money was to be appropriated.

After some remarks from Mr. MERRICK in reply,

Mr. ALLEN opposed the bill at some length. It was bestowing the money on an association whose objects and modes of action were entirely unknown to the Senate.

Mr. HUBBARD said: I do not desire, for myself, any more information, to enable me to vote upon the bill before the Senate, than what the terms of the bill itself convey. I have heard it read—and that is enough for me. The bill directs the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to select from lots of land owned by the General Government, in this city, and to appraise them, and to convey to the Howard Institution the lots thus appraised, to the value of five thousand dollars, for the sole use and benefit of said institution: in other words, the bill proposes to take of the public property the amount of five thousand dollars, and to give the same to a private, local corporation, within the city of Washington. Now, sir, I utterly deny the power of Congress to take from the public Treasury the property of the whole people, and to bestow the same, in charity, to any private individual or to any public institution. This Government was organized for no such object—the Constitution has imparted to Congress no such authority. If a proposition was made to take a like sum from the Treasury, and to grant it to a similar institution within my own State, it would strike every member of the Senate, as it should do, with utter astonishment. To take the money of the whole people—to abstract any portion of the public funds, and give to any private association, within this District—cannot fail to excite in my mind equal astonishment. We have had these appeals made to Congress over and over again. We have been told so often of the noble generosity of the original proprietors, in granting the alternate lots of this city to the General Government, that the story has become stale and unprofitable. What would these lots have been worth to those same proprietors, if this place had not been established as the capital of the Federal Government. What has Congress done for this city, and for this District? I will not, on this occasion, attempt to state. But I should like to see an honest account stated between the Treasury and the District of Columbia. I would like to learn if there rests the least obligation on the part of this Government, on account of what has been so often called the generous liberality of the original proprietors of this city. Sir, we are in error upon this whole matter. We have paid for every public square now owned by the Government—a price per acre beyond its value at the time of the location of the seat of Government. We have, it is true, received the alternate lots without price. But, sir, need I argue to this Senate that such a donation, in point of interest, was the best bargain that ever those proprietors could have made, for themselves or for the District? There are two sides to this account; and if Senators have not already made themselves acquainted with all the facts, they should do it, before they suffer themselves to be influenced by the consideration that the General Government are under pecuniary obligations to this city, and to the original grantors of this public property. Before they yield their assent to the assertion that we are indebted for favors already received, let the account be stated—let it be known what has been expended by the Government for this District, and what has been received into the Treasury for property ceded to the United States. I should be pleased to know what amount of the public money has already been expended for the exclusive use and benefit of this city, and of this District. Such an exhibit will show that, unless I am altogether mistaken, more than two millions of dollars for the uses of this District, has been drawn from your Treasury, beyond its receipts from the amount of property ceded by its inhabitants.

No man more sincerely commends the object in which these charitable ladies have embarked than I do. They are not confined to this District—they exert an influence over every part of the country. No man can be more willing than myself, according to my means, to aid such praiseworthy efforts—they are the appropriate objects for the exercise of individual charity. But Congress, the representative power of the States and of the people, cannot, consistent with a faithful discharge of its public trusts, turn a favorable ear to memorials of this description. For it seemed to be undeniably true, that if Congress can pass this bill, it can make similar donations for like purposes in any other portion of the confederacy. I am, therefore, opposed to the bill upon principle; and I shall feel myself called upon to give such a vote whenever occasion shall require it.

Mr. HENDERSON insisted that, as Congress was the exclusive legislature of this district, they were imperatively bound to make provision for the poor of the District. He also characterized the institution as one of peculiar worth, giving employment to females, for the noble purpose of saving them from the necessity and unavoidable mortification of throwing themselves and their families wholly on public charity.

Mr. MERRICK (as a reply to Mr. ALLEN) read the memorial of this institution, in which its particular doings were clearly set forth, and in which it was stated that they were now rendering their most important assistance to ninety-two different families.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut spoke at much length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. LUMPKIN said it was rather a matter of surprise, to contemplate the various channels or modes of reasoning by which the human mind, in different persons, arrived at conclusions on the same subject, and with the same evidence presented for the consideration of all. At almost every session of Congress, large appropriations of money have been made and expended for the benefit and comfort of the people of the District of Columbia, as well as that of the members of Congress, officers of Government, and citizens of the Union generally. We appropriate money for the improvement of the streets and avenues of this city; to construct bridges, railroads, and canals; to build penitentiaries and jails; to aid colleges and hospitals; to alleviate the calamities of sufferers by fire; and last, though not least, vast sums have been expended to beautify and ornament the extensive pleasure grounds contiguous to this Capitol, and the other public buildings in this city.

Yes, sir, millions have been expended in the manner suggested, and with but feeble, if any, opposition by those who now so zealously oppose this humble and modest proposition to allow the guardians of the poor and suffering widows and orphans of this place to make a judicious application of five thousand dollars' worth of the waste and useless lots belonging to the Government in this city. The object of the bill on your table is not to appropriate money for the daily and direct subsistence of the indigent, but to afford the means to intelligent, judicious, and benevolent individuals, to establish an institution, under such rules and regulations as may afford the means of giving employment to the suffering poor of this city. Many, very many persons in this city, are in abject poverty, often in an actual state of suffering, who could and would earn a reasonable subsistence, if they had employment suited to their ability to perform. It is to provide for such cases, and under such regulations as I have stated, that this bill has been presented to the Senate by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

As regards the constitutional right of Congress to allow these useless lots of the Government to be applied to the benefit of the suffering poor of this city, to the widow, the fatherless, and the orphan, allow me to say, Mr. President, that when the gentlemen who oppose this bill with so much zeal, on constitutional ground, will show me the clause of the Constitution under which they claim the right to make the various appropriations to which I have adverted, and to be applied to the purposes which I have suggested, I will, in the very same clause of the Constitution, show them the authority, in terms equally explicit, to authorize the passage of this bill. I will not be deterred, sir, from giving my vote for this bill by the cry of mad dog. I vote for this bill with much more pleasure and cheerfulness than I could vote for the vast sums which have been expended to ornament and beautify the extensive public grounds around this magnificent building. I hope I may not be considered destitute of taste to enjoy the beauties of ornamental improvement, when I assure the Senate that my daily comfort and happiness depend much more upon seeing happy and comfortable human beings around me, than any ornamental improvement whatever. Sir, suffering humanity makes the strongest appeal to the human breast. Who can enjoy comfort, and be happy, while the suffering orphan, and care worn mother, are destitute of food and raiment?

Mr. President, Congress is the only law making power to which the people of this District can look. Here, sir, we have the power of exclusive legislation. We have listened to and respected the wishes of many of the wealthy and influental citizens of this District. Their petitions are attended to Shall we then, sir, turn a deaf ear to the cry of penury and want? Shall the poor pittance which this bill extends to the humblest objects of our species, become the great subject to base our Constitutional arguments upon? Are we, the constitutional representatives of this people, to deny ourselves the right of exercising the common feelings of humanity? Do not all Christian legislators, under all forms of Government, legislate with special care for the helpless?

Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the cries of this people have reached my ear. I feel that they are a portion of my constituents—a portion lamentably neglected—often reproached when they deserve sympathy. Congress brings upon this people vastly more evils than benefits. All that may be rightfully done for the suffering poor should no longer be neglected, and I trust this bill will receive the sanction of a majority of the Senate, notwithstanding the zeal with which it has been opposed.

Mr. HUBBARD, in reply, said that according to the doctrine of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, Congress should be considered as a great eleemosynary institution for the purpose of dispensing public and private charities. Sir, never in the course of my life have I been more surprised than I have at the declared opinion of my honorable friend upon the subject of the power and duties of Congress, under the Federal Constitution, in relation to this particular matter. What! sir, is Congress to become the great dispenser of charities? Was that the purpose for which this Government was formed? And does that clause of the Federal Constitution which gives authority to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases over the District of Columbia, impose upon Congress the obligation to endow the charitable institutions of this District? Does that clause furnish a sufficient warranty to Congress to take from the public chest the people's money for encouraging and patronizing the charitable efforts of individuals, or of associations, here or elsewhere? No, sir; no. From such a quarter, little indeed did I expect to find an advocate for the measure now before the Senate, and for kindred objects. Is the Senator aware to what extent his doctrine will carry him? If Congress can pass this bill under the authority conferred by the clause in the Constitution to which I have referred, then, sir, I would ask if it has not the power to enter the almshouse of this District, and to provide the ways and the means of supporting the occupants of that resort of public charity? If it has power to pass this bill, it has power to provide for the support of all the paupers, not only of this District, but also of the States.

If it has power to do this with the treasure of the whole country, it has the power to relieve the people of this District from every description of taxation. It can make their highways, and adorn their cities. And if the public money can be appropriated for the support of the public paupers, it can provide the means for the support of the public schools of the District. There is nothing within the wide range of District expenditure, but what Congress can, with the money of the whole people, adequately provide for. I protest against all such latitudinarian doctrines. They are not, in my judgment, to be sustained by the letter or the spirit of the Constitution, under which we live, and by which we profess to be governed.

This very morning, it was proposed to make a disposition of the public funds, for the benefit of the late sufferers at Natchez. A few days since, a bill was before the Senate, appropriating the trifling sum of three hundred thousand dollars for building a railroad from this city to Alexandria. Will the Senator from Georgia give his aid to those projects? Would he be willing to appropriate, from the public Treasury, even the small sum of five thousand dollars, for any charitable purpose, in my own, or in his own State? I hope not, sir. I can go for no such appropriations I would oppose this as I would oppose the appropriation for constructing the contemplated railroad to Alexandria. I would oppose them because Congress possess not, in my judgment, the constitutional right to make such grants. As the trustees of the people, it would be an unwarrantable use of the trust fund to appropriate it for any object not connected with the interest of the cestui que trust. Our business is, or it should be, to legislate for the whole country. We can draw on the Treasury for the support of the General Government. We have a clear right to appropriate the public money for any objects connected with the general defence of the country. But, sir, I deny that Congress has any constitutional right to take a dollar from the funds of the whole country, to construct a road in one place, or to build a church in another. What earthly power under the Constitution, does Congress possess to make these local and sectional improvements? None, sir, none. Entertaining these views, I shall vote against this, and every kindred measure. The Senator from Georgia finds a justification, in his judgment, for the vote which he intends to give upon this bill, in the fact that such appropriations have heretofore been made. This is true, sir, and made upon precisely the same plea that is now urged for this measure. But are we to look to precedents to settle a constitutional power? Precedents in the legislation of Congress can be found for every thing, and the misfortune is, that they are too frequently used against the Government. Precedents may be found for and against appropriations of a local character. For some they prove every thing, for others they prove nothing; they are sometimes urged in favor of a wished for appropriation; they are at other times cited against particular measures. The Senator asks for the authority to appropriate the public money to adorn and improve these public grounds. My answer is that these grounds and buildings are a portion of the public property; and it is clearly within the power of Congress to improve the public grounds and buildings as they may think expedient.

It is confined to their discretion; that discretion may have been abused, but the power cannot be doubted. But where is the justice in comparing appropriations for the improvement of the public grounds and public buildings, with the appropriations contained in the bill now before the Senate? Does it follow, that because Congress had the power to appropriate the public money for the improvement of the property of the Government; does it follow that, because it can alter, enlarge, or adorn the public buildings to suit the convenience of Congress, and according to its own discretion, it can take the funds of the nation to build a church in one place, and a railroad in another? No, sir; the premises warrant no such conclusions. My great object is to keep within the pale of our authority, and to save the Administration from the charge of wasteful and profligate expenditure, by preventing at least appropriations not warranted by the Constitution.

Mr. President, in opposing this bill, I am doing only what I feel constrained, from a sense of public duty, to do. I can only again repeat, that the enterprise is well worthy of those who have so generously and so benevolently employed their best energies in the prosecution of the object; but that consideration is not sufficient to justify me in giving to this measure my support.

Mr. HENDERSON alleged that there was not a State in the Union which did not make legislative provision for the poor. He would not say that it was right to get the means from other States; but he would say that Congress had the same right to appropriate public lands in this District for the support of its poor that any State could have to appropriate its lands for a similar object.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said, if this was a violation of the Constitution, the Constitution was very often violated, by grants for hospitals and other establishments, as well as for public improvements in the District. But what was the Constitution? It gave exclusive legislation over the District to Congress. Was this intended to be a cold, heartless, unfeeling, unpitying legislation? Was it designed that the Government should be kindly, parental, sympathizing, merciful, or was it to be a Government which was to act for the benefit of itself, and to bear down on those governed, without regard to their happiness, unfeeling, merciless, tyrannical? Congress might exercise its power; but must be cautious to exercise it without charity, and without contributing to the happiness and prosperity of the people, thus making them exiles from all the benefits of a just and liberal Government! The States all provided for their poor, and it was equally the duty of this Government to provide for the poor of this District.

Mr. HUBBARD said he was familiar with the clause in the Constitution to which the Senator from Kentucky has referred, and as he has requested, I will willingly give my opinion of the extent of the power thereby conferred upon Congress. It is true, according to the express terms of that instrument, "that Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by consent of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings." Under this power, Congress can establish a civil and a criminal code of laws for this District. It can grant acts of incorporation; it can establish a general system of taxation for the use of this District. It can do these things; but it cannot, by virtue of the power thus conferred, tax the inhabitants of Alexandria for the exclusive benefit of the city of Washington. It cannot compel the city of Georgetown to support the poor, to make the highways, or to bear exclusively the burdens of the other two cities of this District. Under this clause, Congress has no power to levy a direct tax upon the people of my State, or of any other State, to be appropriated for the benefit of this District. It has no power to withdraw from the general fund—a fund collected from the whole people, any portion to be expended on local objects within this District. It has no power to build school-houses, erect churches, make railroads, bestow charities, support the poor, or to educate the children in this city at the charge of the whole country. There exists no more power to make such an appropriation of the common fund within this District, than to make a similar appropriation within any particular section of any State of the Confederacy. Congress has power to legislate for this District; but its inhabitants are bound, under that legislation, to adopt their own municipal regulations at their own proper charge. They are bound just as much to provide for the support of their own poor, and for the education of their own children, as are the counties, towns, and parishes of the respective States.

The Senator has asked whether New Hampshire does not provide, by its legislation, for the supoort of her paupers; and whether Congress has not the same power, and the same duties, in relation to this District, that the Legislature of that State has in relation to her towns. Unquestionably. And what power has the Legislature of New Hampshire over the people of that State? It can pass general laws; it can prescribe the duties of towns; it can impose a system of taxation; but, sir, I deny that the Legislature of New Hampshire has the power to compel, by its legislation, a single town to bear the burdens of the other towns—a single county to bear the burdens of the other counties. I utterly deny that New Hampshire, or any other State of this Union, can appropriate from the common fund, the means drawn from the whole people of the State, to support the schools, the paupers and the highways of any particular town or of any particular section, to the exclusion of the other portions of the State. My own State has no constitutional power to levy a tax upon the people of my own town—to build houses of charity in, or to support the unfortunate and the poor, of another town. And this is my objection to this bill; by direct or indirect taxation you have drawn from the people of my State a portion of the public funds—you have no constitutional right to appropriate that portion for the accomplishment of any local object in this District.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that that this bill will pass, and I have as little doubt that another bill will pass taking three hundred thousand dollars from the Treasury to construct a railroad to Alexandria. These things have been done, and they will be done again. I am perfectly aware of all this; and I am aware, also, that I am performing a thankless office in opposing this bill—that by my untiring opposition to these measures I am rendering myself peculiarly obnoxious to the people of this District.

But, sir, these consequences I must bear. And I can assure the Senator from Kentucky, that it is from a conscientious conviction, (after the most careful examination of the whole matter) that Congress possesses not the power to make these appropriations, that has induced and will induce, me in the discharge of my bounden duty to my constituents, to oppose these measures, so long as I shall have the honor of a seat in the Senate of the United States. With one additional remark, I will resume my seat. Let the doctrines which have been avowed this day on this floor be carried out, and the time is not far distant when we shall not only have to provide support for all the paupers of this District, but we shall have to provide also for the support of the schools—the 'highways and byways"—and for all other burdens to which the District is subject. All that I desire is, that I may be permitted to manifest my determined opposition, by recording my nay to this bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN would ask the Senator whether Congress did not bear the same relation to this District that the State Legislatures did to their respective States?

Mr. HUBBARD. Precisely.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. And I understand that New Hampshire provides for her poor.

Mr. HUBBARD. Yes; but at the expense of the respective towns, and not out of the public Treasury.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. But is it not in the power of the Legislature to do it either way, by towns, by counties, or by the whole State, out of the State Treasury? That is the question. It is a State provision, made by law; a governmental charity. And if it is true that the States have this power, and Congress has not, what is the consequence? The poor of this District are accursed by law and Constitution. The gentleman says they are still entitled to individual charity. And so they are all over the world. They ask the gentleman as a legislator for bread, and he gives them, not a stone, but his blessing, and that is all.

Mr. MERRICK presented, and partly read, the act of incorporation of the Howard Institution, (in reply to Mr. ALLEN and Mr. HUBBARD, who had called it unincorporated.) He also showed that Congress had granted $25,000 to the Columbian College, $25,000 to Georgetown College, and $10,000 each to two orphan asylums, (in reply to Mr. HUBBARD, who had argued, a fortiori, that if Congress had the power of charity they had the power of education.)

The bill was passed by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, and Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Grundy, Hubbard, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Wright—17.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. The question being on Mr. WALL's substitute for the bill—

Mr. STRANGE said, as no one appeared now disposed to speak, he would offer his proposed amendments to the substitute.

Mr. WALL remarked that the bill and substitute proposed two different systems of bankruptcy, and he thought it best to decide first on one of them, as the groundwork of all future amendments.

Mr. NORVELL said he could not vote for either in its present form, and he therefore hoped the Senator from North Carolina would persist in now offering his amendment to the substitute.

Mr. STRANGE now offered his first amendment, which was understood to extend the operation of the substitute to all classes of persons, expressly.

Mr. S. said the popular meaning of the term bankruptcy extended, he believed, at the adoption of the Constitution, to all classes; and the popular meaning was to be taken, rather than the technical.

Mr. WALL argued against this doctrine, as leading to the worst and most inconsistent consequences.

A long debate followed, in which Mr. WALL Mr. STRANGE, and Mr. WALKER participated; and without taking the question,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, May 27, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILLEN] to make a report from the Committee on Commerce, accompanied by a bill for a repeal of the act of 1837, regulating pilots; and to the reception of which report the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] objected.

Mr. RUSSELL, who was entitled to the floor, cited an instance in which a report of a committee was reconsidered, the one objecting being the only person who voted against the motion to reconsider. The Manual, it is true, says that no vote of a committee can be altered except by a vote of the House. This rule in the Manual was adopted some 233 years ago by the British Parliament, and now it was alleged that it was binding on the committees of this House. Mr. R. went into a history of the manner in which Mr. Jefferson compiled the Manual. When compiling it, he connected all the propositions which had existed for the government of the British Parliament, and which had governed the action of the committees of that body. There was no such thing as standing committees in that body at the time this rule was adopted. There was but one Committee of the Whole, and committees to which special reference was made, and no standing committees. He therefore argued that that feature in the Manual was not applicable to the standing committees of the House. He also inferred, from the terms of the resolution adopting the Manual for the government of the House, that that rule in the Manual was not applicable to the standing committees, but the Committees of the Whole only. He argued that no good, but great injury, might result, if the power in the committee to reconsider be denied to the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH considered the argument that a standing committee had no power to reconsider a vote, was absurd. He went on to show that such a course would lead to the most embarrassing results, and, by way of illustration, supposed a number of cases, where a denial of the power to reconsider would lead to the most absurd legislation.

Mr. DROMGOOLE thought it highly desirable that this subject should be settled, so as to establish, in future, a uniform rule for the action of committees. He examined at some length the arguments for and against the right of a committee to reconsider its vote, and contended that there was no parliamentary or other authority by which such a course could be pursued. It was clear that a committee was bound by its own acts, and could not reconsider an order once made.

In case of any difficulty arising from the presentation of additional evidence, after a report had been made, such difficulty might always be obviated by a recommitment. Mr. D. alluded to the parliamentary law of 1607, which decided that a committee was, and must be, bound by its own vote; and gentlemen could not explain away that law. In the course of his remarks, he denied the power of a standing committee to keep a journal, or to evade questions, by laying them on the table. He contended that a committee was bound to decide on all subjects referred to it, either for or against.

Mr. TILLINGHAST argued that, from the circumstance of no standing committees having existed at the time this rule in the Manual was adopted by the British Parliament to regulate the Committee of the Whole, and special committees of that body, it was never contemplated when the Manual was adopted as a part of the rules of the House, that that principle in the Manual should apply to the standing committees, but merely to the Committees of the Whole. The morning hour having expired before Mr. T. concluded,

Mr. ATHERTON called for the orders of the day; before the House passed to which, however,

Mr. SERGEANT, on leave, made a statement in relation to the memorial presented on Monday by Mr. ADAMS, complaining of official misconduct on the part of Judge McLean, and which had been referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which Mr. S. is chairman.

Mr. S. said it would be remembered that a few days ago, the honorable member from Massachusetts had presented a memorial from a citizen of that State, making certain charges, in very grave language, against the conduct of Judge McLean, while acting on the Ohio circuit. The committee thought it due to the judicial character, to the bench, to the public, and to the memorialist himself, to give this matter an attentive and as early a consideration as possible; more particularly as the memorial had been presented by a gentleman of as much authority as any in the House, although that gentleman had stated that he had at first considerable doubts as to the propriety of presenting it; but as it had now been presented, it deserved the immediate consideration which the committee had unanimously concluded to give it. Further, the gentleman from Massachusetts did not, for the most praiseworthy motives, ask that the memorial should be printed, or even read. This was to be regretted, as, had the memorial been read, the committee were unanimously of opinion that the House, after hearing it, would have come to the same conclusion as that of the committee, viz: that the memorial ought not to be entertained. After the reference, the committee proceeded to its consideration as speedily as possible, and they had had already two meetings. On the first meeting they deliberately considered the case of the complainant on his own statement, unaccompanied by any sort of evidence on which the slightest reliance could be placed. At the second meeting of the committee that morning there were seven members present, and they had unanimously come to the conclusion, without any hesitation, after considering the whole case, that upon the petitioner's own statement, there was nothing to justify even an inquiry into the conduct of Judge McLean. Now the particulars of the charges, and the remarks made on the presentation of the memorial, had gone forth to the country, and might occasion a pause in the public mind as to the confidence reposed in that officer, and in the Court of which he was a member; and as this was the case, the committee had thought right to instruct him to make this statement. The report could not be prepared immediately; therefore, the committee considered it a matter of justice that a statement of what the report would be should be made without delay, so that any unfavorable impression on the public mind might be removed.

The memorial was one of a singular character, but perhaps, however, not different from what might have been expected from a disappointed litigant, who thought he had much at stake in the suit, and who had failed to gain his end. Under such circumstances, and in this state of excitement, there could be no doubt but that much allowance ought to be made for the contumacious language of the petition. This was the judgment pronounced against the judge; and it struck him, that of all the judgments in the world, that of a defeated litigant in his own cause, and in his own behalf, was the least entitled to consideration. Nevertheless, the petitioner had made an issue in law between himself and the judge, and had assumed what the motives of the judge were, without any evidence. He had charged the judge with error, and gross corruption and ignorance.

In this way he had gone on to make no less than eighteen specifications, and had named them "Corruption No. 1, Corruption No. 2, Corruption No. 3, etc." filling out the whole eighteen specifications with "ignorance" and "corruption." Thus these heavy charges were made upon no better foundation than the assertion of a defeated litigant, who had undertaken to say the judge had decided wrong. And with this he had produced an allegation that, right or wrong, the judge had delayed his case, and thus deprived him of an opportunity of appealing to the Supreme Court of the United States, without which appeal he was to be ruined. In making those grave charges without any evidence, the petitioner rested them on most important principles in the rules of the court, which rules, he admits, he had no opportunity of seeing, and of which he does not pretend to have any knowledge. He merely assumes what the rule of the circuit court is; and while he admits that he does not know it, he rests his charges on what he thinks it is, and that the judge has not acted in accordance to it. This, however, was contrary to fact, as the rule was in accordance with the decision of the judge. He would repeat, that while there ought to be much allowance for the excitement of a defeated litigant, yet it was very difficult to account for the extraordinary recklessness of the memorialist in making charges against the judge so foul as these were. Mr. S. concluded, by stating that his only object in making the statement was to have it known as early as possible, that the committee were unanimous in the opinion that there was no foundation for the charges of the memorialist, nor was there any thing in the slightest degree calculated to affect the confidence reposed in Judge McLean.

Mr. ALFORD of Georgia moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had, last evening, passed the pre-emptson bill.

Mr. A. proceeded to support his motion, professing himself a friend to the principle of pre-emption, if confined to the bona fide settler, as was done in the early pre-emption bills; but a bill like that which had so hastily been carried through the House, he could consider as nothing else than a bill to give the public domain to the new States. It allowed any person, young or old, black or white, who was on the land when the bill passed, to obtain a pre-emption right. So, if a man had eighteen children, (no uncommon number for a Western family,) he would get, virtually, eighteen preemptian rights. Mr. A. adverted to the great anxiety which had been manifested to rush the bill through the House, without explanation, or even an attempt to defend it; for, as to the speech of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HUBBARD,] it only made confusion worse confounded, and seemed rather to conceal the real merits of the bill from the House. Mr. A. considered the public domain as gone, unless the House should retrace its steps.

He called more particularly upon Southern gentlemen to look at the effects of this bill—this land stealer's bill—for robbing the poor settler, for the benefit of the speculator. The bill was such, that it would, before another Congress, throw all the choice lands of the West into the hands of speculators. The public domain, from which so great a portion of the revenue had hitherto been drawn, would then be gone for little or nothing; and then how was that deficiency in the Treasury to be supplied, except by an increased tariff? He called upon every honest man upon the floor to help him in getting a reconsideration; for it was one of the most shameful and abominable measures that had ever been introduced into the House.

Instead of benefitting the hardy pioneer, who went with his axe on his shoulder to cut down trees, and build him a home in the wilderness, this bill gave to the speculator every chance of stealing the land away from the honest settler. Every one must have observed the manifest uneasiness there was to get the bill through; and if its supporters were not conscious that it was wrong, whence was there so much haste—so much anxiety to stop all debate by the previous question? What would be the consequence? Why, before another Congress, he would repeat, that the whole public domain would be swallowed up by speculators, when it would be then too late to repeal the law. He called upon gentlemen to pause, ere it was too late, and to join with him in reconsidering the vote, so so that these obnoxious portions of it might be amended. If they refused, the poor man must be defrauded, and driven from his home, by these hordes of land stealers and wealthy robbers; for he would give his word that, for the next six months, this bill would give rise to the formation of more land companies than had ever existed before, who would swallow up all the best lands, to the exclusion of the poor, honest settler.

Mr. JAMESON inquired of the CHAIR whether the bill was now in possession of the House, or had been sent to the Senate?

The CHAIR replied it had gone to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana then made a point of order, insisting that as the bill was not in possession of the House, it was too late for the House to reconsider it.

The CHAIR overruled the objection.

Mr. ALFORD proceeded for some time, when

Mr. SMITH renewed the question of order, and read a precedent to confirm his view.

Mr. ALFORD said he hoped the bill would be sent for.

The CHAIR insisting on its decision that the motion to reconsider was in order,

Mr. SMITH took an appeal.

Mr. ALFORD spoke to order, and insisted on the right of the House to reconsider, let the bill be where it might.

Mr. LEET was in favor of sustaining the decision of the CHAIR; and after some remarks on the question of order, he moved the previous question on the appeal.

The previous question having been seconded, and being about to be put,

Mr. SMITH withdrew his appeal.

Mr. PETRIKIN renewed it.

Much confusion here arose, but at length Mr. P. was suffered to speak in support of this motion, which he did, insisting that the first thing to to be done was to send for the bill before it could be reconsidered. Possibly the bill had been sent to the President for his signature.

Mr. TILLLINGHAST spoke to the question of order, contending that the right to reconsider was a constitutional right of the House, which nothing could take away. Though the Senate might have sent away the bill, and though the President might have signed it, if the House reconsider the vote on the passage within the time allowed by the rule, the bill would remain a nullity; it would be of no effect; in a word, it would not be a law.

Mr. WISE suggested to Mr. ALFORD to move that the bill be sent for.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, after some preliminary remarks, moved the previous question on the appeal.

The motion was seconded, put, and carried, and the main question being on sustaining the decision of the CHAIR,

Mr. CRABB demanded the yeas and nays; but the House refused to oreer them, and the vote being taken, the decision of the CHAIR was sustained without a count.

Mr. ALFORD then resumed and proceeded to speak with great earnestness against the bill, especially against giving every settler on one quarter section of land a floating claim on the quarter section adjoining, the result of which would be equivalent to giving him both for the price of one; because the other would never sell, if subject to the float. It also subjected the honest settler to the fraudulent claims of speculators, who could hire perjured witnesses to swear him out of his improvement. Mr. A. referred to great frauds perpetrated in Alabama, near his own residence, and within his own knowledge.

While Mr. A. was proceeding in his argument, the bill was returned from the Senate with the signature of the Vice President, and taken up to the Chair to await the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. A. now commented with increased severity on the unprecedented speed with which this bill had got through both Houses, which he contrasted with the snail like progress of many meritorious private claims.

He spoke of the effect of the bill in covering the 16th section in every township reserved for purposes of education; and the result in ultimately giving the settler who happened to have set down on such section a float to the same amount. He appealed, in conclusion, to Southern gentlemen, on the effect of having the public lands thus filched out of the Government; it must necessarily lead to an increase of the tariff, &c.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama said the bill had been fully analyzed before its passage by two of the most able opponents of the bill; they had pointed out all the evil efforts which they apprehended would grow out of the passage of the measure; and firmly believing that those gentleman, as well as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ALFORD] were entirely mistaken in the construction they gave the bill, and that their apprehensions of the bad effects to grow out of it were not well founded, and being satisfied that no good could grow out of a protracted discussion, he moved the previous question.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, that the motion to reconsider was in order; and was about proceeding to discuss the appeal, when the CHAIR ruled that it was not in order to discuss the appeal.

Mr. WISE here interposed, and said the gentleman's object avowedly was to say something upon the merits of the bill. The section of country from which he came was more interested in the measure than any other, and therefore he hoped the House would hear him. But there being cries of "question,"

Mr. CHAPMAN withdrew his appeal.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 69, nays 108.

So the House refused a call.

Mr. UNDERWOOD solicited the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CHAPMAN] to withdraw the motion for the previous question, to enable him to make a few remarks on the bill.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama said he could not do so.

The question being whether the previous question shall have a second, and tellers having been demanded to ascertain that fact, and Messrs. CHAPMAN of Alabama and GERRY having been appointed, reported that there were—ayes 90, noes 70.

So there was a second.

The question then recurred whether the main question shall now be put? when

Mr. LINCOLN demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 155, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Wm. R. So the main question was ordered.

The question then recurred on the motion to reconsider; when

Mr. LINCOLN demanded the yeas and nays on the question; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 96, nays 103, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Sampson H. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—103.

So the House refused to reconsider the bill.

The House then passed to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions, in compliance with a resolution of the 26th inst. copies of the papers in relation to the claim of Aaron Mellon of Massachusetts, a soldier of the late war with Great Britain, for an invalid pension.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, it was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Various Senate bills on the SPEAKER's table, were taken up, read twice, and appropriately committed.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BANKS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury Bill.

Mr. CUSHING, who was entitled to the floor on the above bill, spoke a short time in opposition to it, when

The committee rose, and the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BANKS, of Virginia, in the chair) resumed the consideration of the bill "to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue."

Mr. CUSHING resumed his remarks in opposition to the bill, and concluded at twenty-five minutes before 6 o'clock.

Mr. LOWELL then took the floor in reply to Mr. CUSHING, and in defence of the bill. He was proceeding to examine the relative merits of the deposite system, and the present measure, with a view of showing that the latter was the more constitutional, safe, and convenient mode of keeping the public money, when, at the request of several members, he suspended his remarks, and

Mr. PARRIS moved that the committee rise; which motion was agreed to, and the committee accordingly rose; when

Mr. RANDOLPH moved an adjournment; on which motion,

Mr. HAND called for the yeas and nays, which, having been ordered, and being taken, were, yeas 65, nays 50.

The House, at 6¼ o'clock p. m. adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, May 28, 1840.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of sundry citizens of Provincetown, Massachusetts, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of their harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the memorial of Samuel Martin of Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported unfavorably on the bill from the House for the relief of John England.

Mr. WHITE, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of Jacob Becker, recommending its passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported, without amendment, the bill for the relief of the sureties and heirs and representatives of Melancton W. Bostwick, deceased.

Mr. W. from the same committee, also reported, without amendment, the bill to regulate enlistments in the army and navy.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported, without amendment, the House bill for the relief of Pierre Molaison and others.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Bliss and Creighton, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which motion was agreed to.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, unfavorable to the petition of Rd. T. Mason, was considered and concurred in.

Mr. KNIGHT, on leave, introduced a bill entitled "An act concerning the prisoners of the United States committed to the jail in the county of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the bills from the House for the relief of Catherine Allen, the widow of Phebe Dickman, and John Strickland; and on the memorial of John Keeler and Lot Stricklin.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the States to tax any lands within their limits sold by the United States.

Mr. NORVELL said that he had, the other day, presented his views of the financial and pecuniary bearing of the bill now under consideration. He had then stated that, by the compacts accompanying the admission of the several new States into the Union, the public lands sold within their respective limits were exempt from taxation for five years from the day of sale. Michigan and Arkansas constituted exceptions to this rule. They were entitled to tax the lands within their limits as soon as they were sold by the United States. The object of the present bill was to place the other new States, in this respect, on an equal footing with the States of Arkansas and Michigan. The effect of the measure would not be to diminish the sales of the public lands at all, especially to actual settlers—the only class of persons to whom it was desirable to sell the public domain. The sales in Michigan and Arkansas, compared with those in the other new States, would conclusively demonstrate the truth of this assertion. He believed that it was not for the interest of the United States to continue the exemption of lands in the hands of individuals from taxation. Of course, those already sold by the Government, purchased, as they were, under a pledge of the public faith that they should not be taxed for five years, must continue exempt from taxation to the end of that time. The bill annulled the exemption only as regarded lands hereafter to be sold. He had been surprised to hear it stated by his friend from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] that this bill would have the effect of taking from the new States their two and three per cent. funds, derived from the proceeds of the public lands, and that the good faith of the Government required a continuance of the benefit of that fund to the States entitled to it. He had been equally surprised to find that the interest of the Cumberland road would be injuriously affected by the proposed bill. Now, sir, by the compacts with the new States, several restrictions and grants were provided. They were all sacred, and could not be repealed, except with the consent of the parties to them. This bill proposed that the United States should relinquish to the States the right to tax the public lands as soon as they passed into the hands of individuals, if the States chose to accept the boon. It was perfectly competent to Congress to take off the restriction upon the States on this subject, if they deemed it proper to do so. But the bill was limited to this single object. It did not propose to ask the States to surrender the two and three per cent. fund to the General Government. This could not be done without the consent of the States; and their consent to such a surrender was neither suggested in the bill, nor did the United States desire it. The public faith was, therefore, not involved in the question. If the two or three per cent. fund, so far as the Cumberland road was concerned, were not already exhausted, it would continue to be applied to the completion of that road. In no possible state of things could the bill have the least bearing on the Cumberland road.

He now proposed to add to these views, which he had briefly expressed when the bill was up before, a single remark or two upon the political effects of the bill. One of the greatest complaints coming from the new States, with regard to their peculiar positions, was, that many of their sovereign rights, much of their rightful jurisdiction, which remained with the old States, had been taken from the new. Among these rights and this jurisdiction, those which related to the vacant domain within their limits, and to the imposition of taxes upon all real property, were, perhaps, the most important. In these respects, the new States were in the condition of inferiors to the old States, and of vassals to the United States. They were not upon an equal footing, as the Constitution required, with the original States of this Union. It was the object of the bill to restore to the new States their sovereign right of taxation, so far as respected all public lands, as soon as they were sold; and he had been astonished, he had been astounded, when he had heard an objection to this proposition proceeding from any Senator from a new State. It was true that this bill had been introduced by an individual member—by himself; but it had been introduced after a consultation with the Committee on the Public Lands, and with their decided concurrence. It had been referred to that committee, by whose instruction he had reported it to the Senate. He believed that a similar bill had heretofore twice passed this body; certain it was, that he had introduced and reported the bill from the best of motives. He had done so from a strong attachment to the political rights, interest, and equality of the new States, from high considerations of principle, connected with State sovereignty, and from a desire that the other new States should possess the same power to tax the public lands when sold, which was enjoyed by the States of Michigan and Arkansas. If, however, the other new States did not desire the boon, he should not, as he had said the other day, be disposed to force it upon them. It was for them to decide the question for themselves.

The bill was further supported by Messrs. YOUNG, KING, SEVIER, HUBBARD, CLAY of Alabama, TAPPAN, and ROBINSON, and opposed by Messrs. WHITE and BUCHANAN; when, the hour of one having arrived, it was informally passed over.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy was taken up.

Mr. WALL, by consent, amended the substitute, by restricting it to persons engaged in "buying and selling," instead of "trading."

Mr. STRANGE then moved to strike out the words just inserted, so as to remove all restrictions, and make it general in its application.

Mr. WALL spoke at length in opposition to this amendment; and it was advocated by Messrs. STRANGE, WALKER, and WEBSTER; and, the question being taken, it was carried—yeas 37, noes 3, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Webster, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Hubbard, Wall, and Williams—3.

Mr. STRANGE then moved to strike out that part of the bill which, in the distribution of the assets of a bankrupt, gave a preference to the claims of a State, or those to whom State laws gave a preference; which, after some remarks by Messrs. SOUTHARD, STRANGE, WALL, WEBSTER, BUCHANAN, MOUTON, and WALKER, was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, May 28, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order during the morning hour, was the question of order raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] against the reception of the report of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILLEN] from the Committee of Commerce, accompanied by a bill for the repeal of the law regulating pilots. The objection was raised on the ground that since the adoption of that report of the committee, it had reconsidered it and adopted another report of different conclusions.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, who was entitled to the floor, contended that the House had abrogated the principle of parliamentary law; that the standing committees had no power to reconsider a vote, and had adopted the principle of reconsideration. The rule of the House, according to the practice of the House, being in direct conflict with the parliamentary practice of England, as laid down in the Manual, was not, by the terms of its adoption, binding on this House; because it was only so far adopted for the government of the House, as when it coincided and agreed with the principles of the standing rules. He argued in favor of a committee to reconsider its vote, as often as it thought proper to enable it to come to the most correct conclusions, and to afford the House the most light upon the questions committed to it.

Mr. RYALL, after some preliminary remarks, in which he adverted to the facts of the case as they at present stood, contended that the reference of the remonstrances to the committee, after their report had been ordered to be made, was of itself a sufficient reason for the reconsideration of that report. Many of those remonstrances had come from the State which he had the honor partly to represent; and standing as he did as a Representative from New Jersey, it became his duty to ask what was the situation in which those remonstrances were placed? If it should be decided that the committee had no right to consider them, after having previously agreed upon a report, what was to be done with them? Were they to be considered as in possession of the House, or of the Committee on Commerce? It was in reference to this point that he had risen to address the House. He fully agreed with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] that this was a very important question; and as it was a question of no party character, one in which all must have an interest, he hoped it would be at once settled. The question they had to decide, was, whether there was any rule of the House which would cover this matter. He contended there was no rule. The inquiry was, whether the House would now order that a special rule should apply to the Committee on Commerce, for it could not embrace the other standing committees.

Mr. R. asked what were the objects proposed by the reference of subjects like these to the standing committees? Was it not with a view of getting all the facts? Did not the committees report such facts which formed the principles of action for the House to legislate? If so, how absurd it was to deny the power of reconsideration, when a reference of new matter made such a reconsideration necessary. For his part, felt bound to give his voice in favor of receiving the report of the chairman as the report of the committee.

Pending the remarks of Mr. R. Messrs. CURTIS and HILLEN made some explanations in relation to certain facts connected with the motion to reconsider in the committee room.

Mr. HILLEN complained that the motion had been made during his absence, and contrary to his wish.

Mr. CURTIS stated that Mr. HILLEN had been distinctly told that such a course was intended, and that it was not himself who made the motion, etc.

Mr. HABERSHAM argued that the committee had the power to reconsider any vote it might give, upon sufficient reason therefor. He also contended that the authority cited from Jefferson's Manual to the contrary, did not apply to the standing committees, but to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DICKERSON was proceeding to give his views on the subject, when

The CHAIR announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. ATHERTON called for the orders of the day.

Mr. TRIPLETT asked the consent of the House to present a bill supplementary to the pre-emption bill, passed on yesterday, restricting the right of pre-emption to heads of families and housekeepers; and to prevent any other person from locating the lands on which a settler may have his dwelling, and improvements, and farm, until it may have been exposed to sale at public auction.

Mr. T. said he had consulted the men who had a practical knowledge of the subject, and who lived among the settlers, and it had met their approbation. It had also met the approbation of the Chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LINCOLN inquired by what authority the chairman dispenses such a favor.

Mr. TRIPLETT said it was not a favor, but a matter of right. Mr. T. moved to suspend the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion.

The CHAIR informed the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIPLETT] that he could not make the motion to suspend the rules, inasmuch as he was not entitled to the floor—the House having determined to pass to the orders of the day. The gentleman could make his motion in the morning.

Mr. TRIPLETT then gave notice that he would on to-morrow move to suspend the rules for the purpose of submitting the bill.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Senate bill providing for the safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue—the question pending being on the motion of Mr. CUSHING to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. LOWELL being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from last evening in defence of the bill. With a view of showing the evil effects of a paper money system, he reviewed at some length the course of the continental Congress at the time of the war in issuing such large amounts of bills, which, notwithstanding every effort to the contrary, became so depreciated, that at one time five hundred dollars of it would not purchase a day's food for a laboring man. He then went on to argue that Congress had no constitutional power to employ banks, and establish them as fiscal agents for the disbursement of the revenue in paper money; but on the contrary it was the clear intention of the convention who framed that compact to provide for a hard money currency.

In proof of the position thus assumed, he gave a history of proceedings of that convention, and showed that the power of the Government to make a paper currency was expressly denied by a vote taken therein. He also cited the opinions of Madison, and other distinguished men of that day, and also quoted from the writings of Madison, and portions of the debates in the convention, which proved beyond cavil, that it was never contemplated that this should be any thing but a hard money Government.

He then showed the great superiority of the present measure in point of convenience and security, over any other system for the keeping of the public revenue. He gave a detailed history of the Bank of the United States, and the great evils which had resulted from the employment of that institution as the fiscal agent of Government. For the purpose of showing the sympathy which existed between the paper system of this country and England, and between the Bank of England and the Bank of the United States, he gave a history of the expansions and contractions of these institutions, and proved that very soon after the Bank of England inflated the currency and gave every thing a high nominal value, the Bank of the United States, and all the State institutions, followed suit; and that on the other hand, when the Bank of England made a contraction of the currency and involved that country in common ruin, by throwing out of employment all the laborers and mechanics, and causing a complete stagnation in commerce and business of all kinds, that the banks of this country soon after pursued the same course, and produced the like misery and wretchedness. He showed that the banking system made this an importing instead of an exporting country. That it periodically so inflated and depreciated the currency, and gave such a high nominal value to every thing, that it turned the balance of trade against this country—that it enabled the British manufacturers so far to undersell the product of such manufacturers in the United States as to throw out of employment the labor of this country in those establishments, and to give employment to foreign labor. That the operations of these institutions gave periodically such an unnatural stimulation to trade by inflating the currency that it caused the merchants to import more in one year than the nation could consume in three; and thus, by the same process which embarrassed the operations of trade, it cut off the revenues of the Government, and embarrased its operations. He proved that the banks had, instead of attending to their legitimate operations in this country, established agencies in England, to speculate in cotton, tobacco, and to deal in State stocks. He proved that by such operations as these, the business of the United States, of all kinds, was in an embarrassed condition; and the derangement of the currency was in consequence of the acts of the banks, and not attributable to the policy, or any act of the Administration. The banks, he said, had, by their own acts, divorced themselves from the people, and from the people's Government, at the very time, too, when they were cherished by the Government; and he was in favor of that divorce continuing; he was utterly opposed to connecting again the banks, with their tremendous and corrupting powers, with the Government, thereby to increase the patronage and strength of the Executive. He was for separating the money power from any connection with the Government—the Government was strong enough without it. He proved that the banks, upon the principles now established, were not proper or safe depositories for the Government funds; they wanted radical reform—such reform as could only be effected by State legislation. He was in favor of making such a currency for the people as was contemplated by the Constitution; that is, a gold and silver currency for general circulation, and large notes for the use of the merchants for purposes of commerce.

In alluding to the remarks of Mr. CUSHING, who asked why this measure was not deferred until next year, so that the matter might be submitted to the people, Mr. L. contended that it had already been fairly submitted to the people. By a reference to the elections in the States of Massachusetts, Maine, New Jersey, Ohio, and other States, he showed that, when the people had had an opportunity of manifesting their wishes, they had decided in favor of the measure. Yes; this subject had already been put to the people who had acted upon it, and who elected their Representatives with a view to this great question; and when the question should be taken, he would prophesy that the measure would be carried through by the votes of members so instructed.

The committee here, at half past two, took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

Mr. LOWELL resumed his remarks. Alluding to the charge that this bill was intended to create "one currency for the Government and another for the people," he contended that to the degree in which gold and silver was paid to Government, to such degree would the currency of the country be benefited by the substitution of a sound and safe currency for bank paper. He said there was a grand mistake into which many persons fell when speaking of the people; they generally considered the banks as the people, which was a great fallacy, and calculated to lead them away from the true issue. Experience had shown that the banks and the people were two different interests.

Another objection to the bill was, that it would increase Executive patronage. Now could the Executive, if he were so inclined, find a surer means of increasing his power, than by forming an alliance with the numerous State banks? There was no other plan by which so great a share of power could be secured, as that of an alliance with banks, and the interests connected with them. But the present measure was calculated to afford no means of increasing the Executive power, compared with that of banks.

It had been asserted that the system was already in operation, and yet there was distress throughout the land. But from whom did those cries of distress come? They came, not from the people themselves, but from the bank officers and speculators, whose interest it was to have it believed that such distress prevailed. Mr. L. then adverted to various facts to show that this cry of distress was false, and only raised for the purpose of producing a panic. He said the crowded wharves, the steamboats and railroad cars, gave the lie to the doleful tales poured in upon us by these Bank men. These cries came not from the poor man; they came from those who lived in splendid palaces, from men who fared sumptuously every day, and who rode in their carriages. These were the men who were uttering complaints against the extravagance of Government, while they themselves were surrounded by extravagance, and revelling in luxury. He then went on to show how many times the country had been ruined, according to the account of these speculators; and, notwithstanding it had thus been so frequently ruined, it was yet one of the best countries upon earth.

Another objection was, that this measure would have the effect of raising the price of provisions, and of injuring the agricultural interest. But history showed that the operation of a United States Bank went directly to produce such a result, and that it had done serious injury, by raising and depressing the price of its provisions at its pleasure. In proof of this, he referred to a table, which will be inserted when his remarks appear in full.

Mr. CUSHING having referred to England, as an instance of the beneficial effects of banking, Mr. L. caused to be read at the Clerk's desk, a report made to the British House of Commons, showing the injurious effects of that system upon the laboring classes.

Mr. L. went on to show how injuriously the sudden rise or fall of prices operated upon the poor man; whereas this measure, unlike the bank system, would tend to regulate and prevent any fluctuation in prices. He also examined, at some length, many objections which had been urged against this measure—a full report of which will be given hereafter.

Mr. ATHERTON then took the floor in support of the bill, and in reply to the objections of Mr. CUSHING. After some introductory remarks, he proceeded to state what were the general principles of the bill. He contended that the money of the people should be safely kept by the people's own officers, responsible to them, and that it ought not to be used by corporations or private individuals. Also, that this bill made provision, by which, through successive steps, all the revenue would be collected in gold and silver, the legal coin and constitutional revenue. He believed this measure would recommend itself, because it was a system combining safety, convenience, and economy. Mr. A. then adverted to the great distress and inconvenience occasioned by the general suspension of specie payments by the banks in 1837, and also by the recent suspension, as proofs of the necessity of adopting some other mode of keeping the public money.

This measure would also enable the Government to control the revenue raised for legal and constitutional purposes. It provided for the security of the funds, by a system of checks and bonds, so that even the most unforeseen exigencies would be guarded against, and that powerful temptation—the use of the public money—be removed. This was a very important provision, for experience had proved that the use of the public money by officers of Government, was the true cause of all the defalcations.

This bill provided for a system most consonant to the principles of our Republic and free institutions. Why? He would show it. In the first place, he laid it down as a proposition that the taking possession of the public revenue, and using it for the purpose of private gain and speculation, necessarily gave power and control over that revenue. Secondly, the control of that revenue, necessarily gave a high degree of political power, for money was the sinews of political, as well as physical warfare. If so, then came a third proposition, which was, that the people are the true source of all political power, and not the banks. The banks, then, not being the source of political power, ought not to be entrusted with it. Banking companies were not politically responsible, and ought not to be entrusted with political power. He was sure no gentleman would rise and contend that the banks were politically responsible; then why ought those institutions to be entrusted with the public revenue, the possession of which conferred political power.

After explaining many other beneficial results which would arise from the adoption of this measure, Mr. A. referred to a remark made by Mr. CUSHING on a former day, "that this scheme had originated with Hamilton, who, finding it would not answer, discarded it," etc. Mr. A. showed that instead of the scheme originating with Hamilton, it originated with the Constitution itself, and was in operation at the time of Hamilton. Instead of the measure having a Federal origin, it was the measure of the Constitution, which was rejected by Hamilton so soon as he thought he had sufficient power to make the change from that to a United States Bank. Mr. A. read a number of extracts from works of authority, proving that fact.

After some further observations, Mr. A. expatiated on the "safety" of this measure, compared with that of the deposite, or United States Bank system. He adverted to the great cry which had been raised in respect to the defalcation of Swartwout, and which had been used as an argument against this scheme. But, said Mr. A. that defalcation took place under the deposite bank system, and is, therefore, no argument against this measure, which proposes to place the money in the hands of collectors, under a rigid system of checks. Besides, were officers of a bank any more to be trusted than officers appointed by Government? Did not experience show that bank presidents, and bank cashiers, were sometimes as bad as other offenders?

Again, it was urged that a single officer of Government, entrusted with so much money, was liable to abscond, whereas, a banking corporation could not. But if a corporation could not abscond, that corporation might become an abstract nonentity, so that the law could not touch them, which was all the same. In addition to this intangibility of their nature, the officers of a corporation could, and did, abscond the same as Swartwout.

Mr. A. then went on to examine documents, to see the relative amount of loss under the present system and that of the banks; and showed that the loss from defalcation of public officers was not a fifteenth part of that arising from the depreciation of bank paper.

In noticing the several arguments of Mr. CUSHING, in favor of the banking and credit system, he adverted to the affairs of Great Britain, on which Mr. C. had passed a glowing eulogium. But, said Mr. A. the gentleman has given us but one side of the picture. While he has held up to our view the splendid palaces and luxuries of the great, he has omitted to notice the scenes of beggary and desolation which stalk forth over that land. He has forgotten to tell us of the poor man's hovel, and the wretched condition of the population in the manufacturing districts, where young children are sent to a premature grave, by hard and unhealthy labor, and whose parents spend the whole of their existence in a hopeless struggle against the demon, starvation. If the gentleman would give both sides of the picture, he would find that Great Britain was no very great argument in favor of his system. Besides, the gentleman had connected banking and civilization together. But if civilization depended upon banking, how was it before 1694, when that system was established in England? Would the gentleman contend that England was not civilized before that time, and that Shakspeare and Milton were not civilized?

After answering a great many other points raised by Mr. CUSHING in favor of the banking system, Mr. A. said he would take a single objection raised by Mr. C. against this bill, which would serve as a specimen of all the rest. It was in relation to the provisions of the sixteenth section, which required that "certificates of deposite" should be given by the collector or agent when money was paid over to him. Now it was contended by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that these certificates of deposite would become a part of the paper currency of the Government! How could such be the case? How could a mere receipt or certificate of deposite for money paid become a part of the currency? Would gentlemen pretend to say that with such certificates it would be possible to travel from one part of the country to another? Would any body be foolish enough to take such receipts for money? Why, upon the very same principle, a man, after paying a debt, and getting a receipt, might go into a store and attempt to purchase goods with that receipt. Such a man would be laughed at as insane; and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts warns the people, that, in case this bill should pass, these receipts or certificates of deposite will become a part of the currency! Such, said Mr. A. are the arguments which gentlemen who oppose this bill use to terrify and alarm the people.

After confuting many other objections in the same way, Mr. A. concluded by demanding of the Opposition that if they were not satisfied with this measure, they should propose some other in its stead. They all acknowledged that some remedy was necessary, and if this did not suit them, the country would demand of them that they should propose something which did. If they refused, it would plainly prove that they dare not propose their system, and that they were waiting to establish their favorite United States Bank, not by argument, but by suffering.

The remarks of Mr. A. will be given in extenso as early as convenient.

Mr. LEET next obtained the floor, but, without proceeding in his remarks, the committee rose; when,

On motion of Mr. CURTIS,

The House, at 9 o'clock, p. m. adjourned.

IN SENATE,

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of General D. L. Clinch was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

An act to amend an act approved the 18th of January, 1839, entitled an act to amend an act entitled an act to require the judge of the District of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State, approved June the eighteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, and for other purposes, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and after several amendments had been proposed, discussed, and disposed of, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate then went into Executive session,

And afterwards adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, May 29, 1840.

Mr. CHINN asked leave to submit a resolution, calling upon the Postmaster General for information of the time when the postmaster at Baton Rouge became a defaulter, &c.

Objection having been made to its reception,

Mr. CHINN moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer it, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 54, nays 34.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. TRIPLETT gave notice that he would, on Monday next, ask leave to introduce the bill indicated by him on yesterday, supplementary to the act granting pre-emptions to settlers on the public lands.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the question of order raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CURTIS] against the reception of the report of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HILLEN,] from the Committee on Commerce, accompanied by a bill for the repeal of the law regulating pilots.

Mr. DICKERSON, who was entitled to the floor, argued in favor of the right and power of a committee, under the settled principles of rules, to reconsider a vote. He said the gentlemen, who now questioned the right of a committee to reconsider a vote on the adoption of a report, should have met the question when it was proposed to refer the remonstrances which were received since the adoption of that report. The vote had been reconsidered, and the House, by the act of referenee of the remonstrances, received subsequently to the report, was, in itself, authority to the committee to reconsider. He considered it a matter settled. He argued that it was a power inherent in all deliberative bodies to reconsider; and that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] was mistaken when he supposed the committees claim the right by the rule to reconsider, such was not the case. That right existed; but if the rule was applicable at all, it was to control the power and natural right of committees to reconsider; and not to confer the right. It could not be to confer the right, because the right was inherent in the body. The rules merely regulated the natural powers of the committees or of the House. Therefore those who contend that a committee had no right to reconsider, must show that there was a limitation in the rule of the right to reconsider. He argued, by the terms of the adoption of the rule, that the power had not been limited. Mr. D. adverted to the practice of the committees to show that they had exercised the power to reconsider; and cited a case at this session, in the Committee of Elections, where the question had been raised, and had been decided by a vote of that committee of seven to one, that they had the power to reconsider. He argued that, from the circumstance no instance could be found since the formation of the Government, where a committee had asked the privilege of the House to reconsider a vote, that the power must have been exercised by the committees, without any authority from the House. If such had not been the case, many erroneous decisions must have been made by the committees. The right was as important to the committee as it was to the House. He was willing that the Manual should have all the effect it was intended to have by Mr. Jefferson, but he did not believe that it was ever intended that this principle of the Manual, which had been quoted against the right of a committee to reconsider, was ever intended to be operative and binding on the standing committees. If the principle should obtain, it would give the minority of the committee the power to control the majority on the final action.

Mr. CRAIG said the only question before the House now was, whether the rule which prohibits the right of a committe to reconsider, was in fact a rule adopted by the House. He contended that by the adoption of the parliamentary law as laid down in the Manual by Mr. Jefferson, such a rule was in existence. The rule expressly says that no committee shall reconsider a vote except by authority of the House. The arguments that had been advanced might be a good reason why such a rule should not be adopted, or that it should be repealed, but could not change or set aside the rule as it now existed. The rule was in existence and imperative, that the committee shall not reconsider.

Mr. POPE made an argument in favor of the right of the committee to reconsider a vote, and contended that the report of a committee was not complete till the report was received by the House.

Mr. BRIGGS obtained the floor; when

The SPEAKER announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. J. W. JONES said in consequence of the advanced period of the session, and there being so many important public bills on the calendar to be acted on, he felt himself impelled, by a sense of duty to the country, to make a motion to suspend the rules in relation to private business. He then asked a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer a resolution that the House would then resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He said that he would, if the resolution be adopted, move in committee to take up the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. J. C. CLARK said he would agree to vote for the motion to suspend the rule, if the gentleman would consent to go into committee on the appropriation bills.

[The Independent Treasury bill is the unfinished business of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. When the Administration party made an effort to go into committee on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, which was recently passed, the Opposition were anxious to take up the Sub-Treasury bill in preference, and taunted the Administration with a desire to evade action on the Sub-Treasury bill, to defeat it by staving it off to the end of the session. The Opposition were then in favor of acting on the Sub-Treasury, and now they are for delaying action on it, and to take up the appropriation bills, and thus defeat the bill.]

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and disagreed to by yeas 106, nays 84, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Engrossed bill for the relief of John W. Faunce and Oliver Perren came up on its passage, when,

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, its further consideration was postponed till to-morrow.

Engrossed bill for the relief of John J. Roane was next taken up; and,

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, who was opposed to the bill on principle, it was postponed.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Fry came up on its engrossment.

Mr. TILLINGHAST made a few remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. PROFFIT moved so to amend the bill as to insert the words, "according to law."

Mr. TILLINGHAST opposed the motion as unusual and unnecessary; when the question was taken on the amendment, and disagreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

The bill for the relief of General Daniel Parker came up in its order for engrossment; and

A debate ensued, in which CAVE JOHNSON participated in opposition to the bill on the ground that there was not the shadow of foundation for the claims, and, Messrs. LINCOLN, GOGGIN, and W. THOMPSON, participated in its favor, contending that the claims had been allowed to other officers under similar circumstances; and that it had received the unanimous sanction of the Military Committee. Before the bill was passed upon, the House, at the hour of 2½ o'clock took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER took the chair at the hour to which the House adjourned.

There being but eighteen members present, the House remained in a state of quiescence for ten minutes; when

Mr. BRIGGS moved a call of the House; which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. McCULLOH moved that the House adjourn; and on which motion the yeas and nays having been ordered, were—yeas 5, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burke, Goggin, Holleman, McCulloh, and Petrikin—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Banks, Baker, Beatty, Briggs, Calhoun, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Edward Davies, John Davis, Dellet, Doan, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Everett, Gerry, Giddings, Henry, Howard, James, Charles Johnston, C. Johnson, Kempshall, Kille, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lincoln, McKay, Miller, Montanya, Parrish, Pope, Randall, Russell, Ryall, Samuels, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Strong, Taliaferro, Taylor, Toland, Wick, J. W. Williams, T. W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Lewis Williams—53.

Mr. BANKS moved a call of the House; which was ordered, by—yeas 34, nays 26.

The roll was called over, and 85 members answered to their names; and the list of absentees were called over till 114 answered to their names; when

Mr. BANKS moved that the doors be opened for the purpose of admitting those gentlemen who were outside the door; who he believed would make a quorum.

The list of absentees having been called over, the following gentlemen, who were not present, were excused for various causes, viz: Messrs. Andrews, Anderson, Adams, Brewster, Davis of Indiana, Granger, Hammond, J. W. Jones, Lawrence, Naylor, Reed, Rariden, Wagener, and S. Williams.

Mr. MARVIN moved to suspend all further proceedings in the call, which was disagreed to on a count, by—ayes 37, noes 45.

Mr. GRAVES moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms take the absentees into custody; but

Mr. BANKS having expressed a wish to debate that motion,

Mr. GRAVES withdrew it.

Mr. JENIFER moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. LEWIS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which, on a count, were not ordered—ayes 39, noes 33.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and disagreed to.

Mr. BANKS said, by opening the doors, a quorum would soon be present to do the business of the nation; he, therefore, moved to dispense with further proceedings in the call; and, on that motion,

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were, yeas 55, nays 51.

So all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

Mr. EVANS moved that the House adjourn; but the yeas and nays having been ordered, he withdrew the motion.

The doors having been opened, and a quorum now being present, the House proceeded to business.

The question being on ordering the bill for the relief of Gen. Daniel Parker to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. GRAVES demanded the previous question; which having received a second, and the question being then, "Shall the main question be now put?" that is, on ordering it to be engrossed,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, yere—yeas 75, nays 53.

So the bill having been ordered to be engrossed, was engrossed, and read the third time and passed.

Engrossed bill for the relief of Benjamin Fry, was then read the third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of Andrew Low, the assignee of Low, Taylor and Co. came up in its order on the question of engrossment; when

Mr. PETRIKIN, who opposed the bill in a few remarks, contending that it had not received the sanction of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, and that it would take several hundred thousand dollars out of the public Treasury, moved to recommit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report as the committee may find the facts to warrant.

Mr. EVANS said the committee had given the bill full consideration—had reported all the facts in the case—and that it had been agreed to by a large majority of the Committee of Ways and Means; that, so far from the bill taking from the public Treasury several hundred thousand dollars, the whole amount of the duties paid on the goods (a part of which this bill proposes to refund) was but $44,000.

Mr. HABERSHAM made some remarks in explanation of the bill, and in its favor. Then

Mr. STANLY obtained the floor, and moved the previous question; which received a second.

Mr. BROWN of Mississippi moved that the House adjourn; which was disagreed to—ayes 39, noes 54.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. PETRIKIN again moved that the House adjourn; which question was taken by tellers, Messrs. GRAVES, and CHAPMAN of Alabama acting as such, and was disagreed to by ayes 60, noes 71.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 80, nays 51.

The bill having been engrossed,

Mr. MARVIN moved the previous question on its passage; which having received a second, and the main question being ordered, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE,

The House, at the hour of 7 o'clock, p. m. adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, May 30, 1840.

Mr. ATHERTON gave notice that on Monday next he would make the following motion:

Resolved, That so much of the 127th rule of the House as is in the following words, to wit: "Nor shall any rule be suspended except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present," be, and hereby is, so far rescinded, that the House may, at any time, by a vote of the majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders of the House for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the question of order raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CURTIS] against the reception of the report of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HILLEN,] from the Committee on Commerce, accompanied by a bill for the repeal of the law regulating pilots.

Mr. BRIGGS spoke in favor of the power of the committee to reconsider a vote, when

Mr. VANDERPOEL obtained the floor, said the question had been sufficiently discussed, and moved the previous question; which was seconded.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House.

The CHAIR said that motion was not in order, the previous question having received a second.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS, for the purpose of gaining time, and getting a more full House before the question was taken, as it was an important one, moved that the House adjourn, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered,

Mr. W. withdrew the motion, and substituted a motion to lay the whole subject on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion; which having been ordered, were—yeas 18, nays 126.

So the House refused to lay the question of reception on the table.

The question recurring on the reception of the report of Mr. HILLEN, as the report of a majority of the Committee on Commerce, the question was read from the journal as follows, to wit:

"Mr. HILLEN, a member of the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred memorials from pilots in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston, praying for a repeal of the law of March 2, 1837, concerning pilots, offered to make a report, as from said committee, accompanied by a bill to repeal the said act, and before the said report and bill were read,

"Mr. CURTIS, chairman of the Committee on Commerce, objected to the reception of the report, on the ground that it was not the act of a majority of the committee; although the committee in the first instance had adopted the report now offered to be made, yet it had reconsidered that decision upon the reference by the House of additional papers to the committee, relating to the subject; and had reversed its first decision, and directed him to make a report of a directly opposite character to the report now offered, which he was ready to submit to the House."

[This whole question turned upon the right of the committee to reconsider the vote adopting the report which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILLEN] proposed to make. Jefferson's Manual, which has been adopted as rules for the government of the House when not inconsistent with the standing rules, says: "When a vote is once passed in committee, it cannot be altered but by the House, their votes being binding on themselves." There was no standing rule with which this clause in the Manual could conflict, and consequently was the only rule, in this particular, for the government of the committee.]

Mr. RANDOLPH demanded the yeas and nays on the question of reception.

Mr. HILLEN inquired of the CHAIR if the question was not, whether the report offered by him from the Committee on Commerce, "shall be received as the majority report."

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, were, yeas 86, nays 83, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Craig, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Fletcher, Floyd, Galbraith, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Leadbetter, Leet, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Baker, Bell, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Dickerson, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fisher, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Griffin, Grennell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Kille, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Osborne, Peck, Pope, Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Ryall, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Sorrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—83.

So the report of Mr. HILLEN, as a report from the majority of the Committee on Commerce, accompanied by a bill for the repeal of the law regulating pilots, was received.

The CLERK was in the act of reading the report and bill; when he was interrupted by Mr. RANDOLPH, who inquired of the CHAIR whether a motion to recommit was not in order.

The CHAIR replied that it would be, after the bill was read.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, inasmuch as the rule, which denies the right of a standing committee to reconsider a vote, was considered binding by many gentlemen, and the only way to get round it was, to receive the report and commit it, he accordingly made that motion.

Mr. HILLEN said there was no further matter, in substance, before the committee now, than there was when the report which was received was adopted by a majority of that committee. The subject had been before it for four or five months, and ample time had been given before the report had been adopted. Great indulgence had been given by the committee to those interested and who were opposed to the repeal of the act regulating pilots. The subject had been fully considered by the committee before the report was adopted. There was no new matter in substance referred, or proposed to be referred, to their consideration; he, therefore, hoped that the subject would not be recommitted. He called for the reading of the report and bill.

Mr. BRIGGS made some remarks in favor of recommitting. The House had decided that a committee had no right to reconsider a vote. He, therefore, thought it was important that the subject should be recommitted, that the House might receive the views of the majority of that committee; which, it was admitted, were not presented in the report just received.

Mr. HILLEN said it was the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. BRIGGS said: That report has since been reconsidered; and the majority have adopted another report.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired of the CHAIR whether it was in order to recommit the bill until it had been read, and passed through its proper stage by the rule?

The CHAIR said it was not.

Mr. TILLINGHAST was in favor of recommitting the report. The vote just taken was on the question of reception of the report that had been adopted by a majority of the Committee of Commerce at one time, but which had been subsequenly reconsidered. The vote was a close one; and he believed that if the naked abstract question of right in a committee to reconsider had been presented, the vote would have been different. He hoped the subject would be recommitted.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS rose to make a few suggestions on the subject. The question was the simple one of recommitment. But had it not been just ascertained that the majority of the committee were adverse to the bill, and had already prejudged the question? It would be foreseen that the majority of the committee was not then competent to deliberate upon the matter. With these facts staring us in the face, was it right for the House to send it back to the Committee on Commerce, the majority of whom had not only pronounced their opinion, but also their judgment on this case? Would not such a course be in direct violation of that maxim of the law, which said it was not right to give the lamb to the wolf to nurse? He appealed to gentlemen whether it was right to recommit this subject to a committee, of which the majority had an antipathy to the bill.

The morning hour having expired, Mr. T. suspended all further remarks.

Mr. PROFFIT called for the orders of the day; before passing to which,

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to suspend the rules to enable him to submit a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were, yeas 103, nays 80.

So the rules were not suspended: there not being two-thirds.

Mr. GALBRAITH rose to a privileged question. He said, since the votehe had given on yesterday in favor of the passage of the bill for the relief of General Daniel Parker, he had more fully examined into the merits of the claim, and was satisfied that that bill should not pass. The opportunity was not afforded him to examine the question before the vote was taken. He therefore moved that the vote on the passage of the bill be reconsidered.

Mr. GIDDINGS spoke of the merits of the claim, and said it a bill of more importance than was apparent on its face—that it was an entering wedge to a class of claims of the same character. He said it was not based upon principles of law or justice, but its only merit seemed to be that he was entitled to the claim because others had received it in like circumstances. He argued against the claim.

Mr. COLES advocated the claim; spoke of the several favorable reports which had been made from the Military Committee, and the Ways and Means Committee, in its favor, as proof that there was great merit in the claim. It had also received the favorable consideration of the Departments years ago.

Mr. GOGGIN spoke in opposition to the motion to reconsider, and

Mr. GALBRAITH in favor of that motion; when

Mr. LINCOLN advocated the claim; spoke of the favorable report of the Committee on Military Affairs in 1836, of which the now Vice President [Mr. JOHNSON] was the chairman. That report received the unanimous vote of that committee. He went into a history of the whole matter, and contended that the claim was one of merit unquestionably. If one should rise from the dead, and speak with the tongue of an angel, the merits of the claim could not be made to appear more just or clear.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON argued that every officer similarly circumstanced had received what was proposed by the bill to be given to Gen. Parker; that is, double rations. It was a question of justice and equity, if not of law, and hoped the vote on the passage of the bill would not be reconsidered.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved the previous question; which having been seconded, and the main question ordered, viz: "Shall the vote be reconsidered."

Mr. GALBRAITH demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 86, nays 63.

So the vote was reconsidered.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill; when

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. EVANS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which having been ordered, were—yeas 92, nays 64.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Engrossed bill entitled an act for the relief of John W. Bond and Oliver Perrin, came up in its order; and after a few remarks explanatory of its principles, by Messrs. EVERETT and HOPKINS, it was read the third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of John J. Roane next came up in order on its engrossment, when a debate ensued, in which Messrs. HOPKINS and PROFFIT participated in opposition to the bill, and Mr. PETRIKIN in its favor; but before any action thereon,

The House, at half-past 2 o'clock, took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess the SPEAKER resumed the chair, when

Mr. EVANS of Maine observed that there was no quorum present, and that being the case, the SPEAKER had no right to take the chair, it being contrary to the parliamentary law. The parliamentary law was, that if there was no quorum present, the SPEAKER ought to adjourn the House without any question.

After some debate of a conversational character between Messrs. EVANS and McKAY,

Mr. BRIGGS moved an adjournment.

On that motion Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. EVANS again insisted that the SPEAKER could not, in accordance with parliamentary law, entertain a question on the adjournment. If there was no quorum present, he was bound to adjourn the House forthwith.

The question then being taken on the motion to adjourn, resulted as follows—yeas 46, nays 47.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. EVANS then called upon the SPEAKER to adjourn the House, there being no quorum.

Mr. PROFFIT read the rule which relates to the adjournment of the House.

Mr. EVANS referred to the Congressional Manual, and argued that the practice in the British House of Commons was for the Speaker to adjourn the House without any question, when it appeared there was not a quorum present. He therefore contended, that in the present case, there being no quorum, the SPEAKER was bound to adjourn the House, without any question on the adjournment.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Maine was partly right and partly wrong. The Speaker of the House of Commons could adjourn the House for want of a quorum without a question being taken; but the rule required him to remain in the chair either two or four hours first, he could not recollect which.

Mr. BRIGGS said as the House had refused to adjourn, he would move a call of the House.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. PETKIKIN moved an adjournment.

Mr. PROFFIT said he was entitled to the floor, and objected to the motion of adjournment being entertained.

Mr. BRIGGS called upon the CHAIR to count the House.

The CHAIR did so, and reported 107 members present.

Mr. HOFFMAN renewed the motion to adjourn.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Tellers were then called for, but refused.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 79, noes 35.

So at half-past 4, p. m. the House adjourned.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill for the relief of John L. Bowman, and Enoch C. Noyes, reported the same without amendment.

The joint resolution, authorizing the President of the United States to accept certain presents from the Imaum of Muscat, and the Emperor of Morocco, and to dispose of the same,

were severally read a third time, and passed.

The report from the Committee on Claims, in the case of the heirs of Robert Fulton, deceased, was taken up, and Mr. MERRICK addressed the Senate, at length, in opposition to the report, and in favor of the claim, but before concluding, the Senate passed to the consideration of the special order.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and after several amendments had been proposed and discussed by Messrs. WRIGHT, CUTHBERT, WEBSTER, STRANGE, TALLMADGE, and PRENTISS—

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to strike out so much of the 18th section as proposed to include banking corporations. He did not intend to go at large into the discussion as to the power of Congress to embrace this class of corporations in the bill under consideration. It had been his misfortune to be absent during a considerable part of the discussion that had been going on, and, therefore, he had not heard all the arguments in favor or including them; but he occupied a position in regard to this matter which settled the question with him without difficulty. He represented a State which had seven banking institutions, the capital of five of which was entirely furnished by herself, and all the liabilities of which she held herself bound to redeem. Of course he was not prepared to put the State of Alabama in a condition of bankruptcy. Of the sixth institution, his State held two-fifths of the capital, and appointed her portion of the direction; and of the seventh institution, two-fifths of the capital was reserved for the State, though not yet taken. By the laws of Alabama, no bank could be organized in it without her being interested in it. Under these circumstances, he could not vote for including banking corporations in the bill, and he hardly believed that any honorable Senator was prepared to include banks so situated. As a friend to the rights of the States, and believing it to be indispensable to protect those rights, and preserve the institutions which the States considered valuable, he could not vote for a bill containing such broad language in regard to them as this did. Chartered by the State, responsible to the States, in many instances responsible to the Legislatures, and in all instances responsible to the judicial tribunals, the States had, also, in many instances received a bonus for the grants of charters. There were many instances of this kind in other States, and, at all events, some benefits had been reserved to the people for chartering these institutions. It was unnecessary to pass on to the other sections; this question was a test question, and he would therefore ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed a wish to address the Senate on the subject; but as the hour was late, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Senate took up and considered, as in committee of the Whole, the bill to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Mexico; and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, June 1, 1840.

Mr. CUSHING rose to a privileged question, but gave way to

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, who asked permission from the gentleman from Massachusetts to make a brief statement in relation to some important communications from the Secretary of War to the Committee on Military Affairs, in relation to the troubles in Florida.

Mr. T. who is chairman of the Military Committee, proceeded to state that a communication had been received from the War Departments enclosing two letters from the head quarters of the army, conveying the lamentable intelligence that a vigorous attack had been made by the Indians, who had again concentrated their force, in greater numbers than before. He desired that the communications might be read; after which, he was sure the House would agree with him in the opinion that the bill reported by the committee for raising 1,500 men, ought to be acted upon without a moment's delay.

The several letters were then read by the Clerk.

Mr. THOMPSON again expressed his hope that the House would not hesitate a moment in acting upon the bill. It was simple in its nature; its provisions were by no means intricate, and one half hour would be sufficient to dispose of it. If there was any gentleman who might wish to say any thing on the policy of Government or other matters connected with the Florida war, there were several other bills to come up connected with on which such speeches might be made. Under those circumstances, he sincerely hoped that the bill reported by the committee for the raising of 1,500 men, would be suffered to pass without delay. It was a bill having the sanction of the Secretary of War, and although he would not say the measures it proposed would determine the war, yet he was confident it would do more towards bringing it to a speedy close than any other plan. He was sure there could be no serious objection to it, after hearing the communications which had been read, and which were calculated to arouse the feelings of every patriot. He was confident the House would not refuse to go into Committee of the Whole at once on the bill. He entreated it, nay, in the name of the suffering people of Florida, he demanded that action should at once be had.

Mr. T. concluded by moving a suspension of the rules for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the aforesaid bill.

Mr. DOWNING of Florida wished to say a few words on this subject, in addition to what had been already stated by the gentleman from South Carolina. Mr. D. stated that he had received letters from Florida, dated the 23d May, some little time later than the date of the facts referred to by the Secretary of War, and which confirmed the accounts transmitted to the Department. He said that among other instances of outrage, was one where two wagons had left the city of St. Augustine, under an escort of five United States soldiers, but they had not proceeded above six miles from the city before they were attacked.

After reciting the particulars of this outrage, which were not heard by the Reporter, Mr. D. appealed to the House, whether, under this state of things, it could deny protection to the people of Florida any longer; when it appeared that not a man could leave his home without danger of an attack, and where no citizen was safe, but in a walled town? He sincerely hoped there would be no objection to taking up the bill.
